EXTRACT FROM ADDRESS OF E. F. WHITEHURST, PRESIDENT FEDERATED MANUFACTURERS CORPORATION, DELIVERED BEFORE THE FOREIGN TRADE CLUB OF CALIFORNIA

I am giving you to-day the media through which more than $1,000,000 of new overseas business was secured. The character of the commodity dealt in was technical and engineering products. The figures given are authentic and are of very recent compilation. In all shipments were sent to 41 different countries. The media through which the business was secured was assumed to be that through which the overseas buyer first came into contact with the American company.

From the tabulation of the information taken from the card records the following statistics have been obtained:

1. Orders secured as the result of previous acquaintanceship and experience of the overseas buyers with the American company, 36.8 per cent.
2. Business secured from overseas buyers who were directed to the American company by satisfied customers of the American company, 24.7 per cent.
3. Business secured through the cooperation of the United States Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, 20.1 per cent.
4. Business secured through overseas salesmen of the American company, 11.7 per cent.
5. Business secured through correspondence with firms not previously acquainted with the American company, 3.2 per cent.
6. Business secured through the cooperation of the chambers of commerce, foreign trade associations, etc., 2 per cent.
7. Business secured from advertising in American export publications, directories, etc., 6 per cent.

The net profit realized on sales secured through the cooperation of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce showed a profit on the outlay of over 20,000 per cent. Net profit realized as the result of business secured through overseas salesmen showed a profit of 6 per cent. Business secured through correspondence showed a loss of 28 per cent. Profit realized from business secured through the cooperation of the chambers of commerce and foreign trade associations was practically infinite as practically no expenditure was incurred in securing this business. Business secured through advertising in American export publications, etc., showed a net loss of 84 per cent on the investment. The most surprising fact revealed by these statistics is that over 20 per cent of the total business secured was directly traceable to the efforts of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, sales from this source coming ahead of business secured by the company's overseas salesmen, as well as also totaling a greater amount than business secured through direct solicitation by correspondence or advertising.

EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS OF COMMENDATION RECEIVED BY THE BUREAU OF FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC COMMERCE DURING THE PERIOD JANUARY 1 TO APRIL 10, 1925

Ever since I got a glimpse of the report of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce early in December I have wanted to write to you just to be on record in evidencing appreciation of the wonderful work your bureau has accomplished.

More than 2,000,000 acts of service to business during the year ended, of course, gives no adequate picture of the values arising out of them.

When one thinks of the bureau's appropriation as under $3,000,000 and of the billions of dollars worth of business your bureau can further serve, it is certainly clear that American business is getting a hitherto unheard of bargain in your bureau. The most reasonable thought this suggests is that the appropriation ought to be multiplied many times. (An advertising agency of New York City.)

We believe that a piece of work well performed is worthy of praise. For that reason it has been in the mind of the writer to write you expressing the deep appreciation of this company for the many favors and great amount of information that has been given us by the various foreign posts of your department.

In order to give a complete report of all of the services we have received too much of your time would be taken up, but we will say that never in a single instance have the representatives of the United States failed to give us full reports, constructive criticism, and in addition offering us further assistance.

While I am about it, I also wish to tell you that your Seattle office is giving very fine, efficient service.

As seasoned exporters and developers of foreign markets for American goods, we believe that we probably recognize expert service better than any magazine writer or tourist, and we feel that it is only just to tell you we appreciate and value the work of the personnel of your department. (Seattle export house.)

We have had so much fine cooperation from your department that we feel that every American business firm engaged in foreign trade would be justified in making a substantial direct contribution to its maintenance, and are convinced that most of them would be prepared to do so.

If at any time we can assist you by bringing the fine activities of your department to the notice of our Congressmen, we will be more than pleased to do so. Your activities have been the direct result of substantial profits to us on more than one occasion. (A San Francisco manufacturers' corporation.)

I have read with deep and serious interest the evidence which you gave before the House Committee on Appropriations. I want to take this opportunity of indorsing the many tributes which have been paid to the efficiency and helpfulness of your bureau in widening the scope and raising the prestige of American export trade. The export department of this company has received the very finest cooperation from your bureau, and we are able to trace definite business as a result. (A Pennsylvania manufacturer of batteries.)

As you know, we have constantly called on you during the past several years for information of all sorts in connection with our exporting of mahogany and hardwood lumber. In fact, we have at times felt embarrassed at asking for so much information and in taking up so much of your time. We have always received from you prompt and concise information of the sort we wanted, and this has been a great help to us in developing our business.

We are doing business through three or four European agents, with whom we made our connections solely through your help and advice, and we find that the information you have given us regarding them has been borne out by actual experience. Also in one case when we appointed an agent against your advice we have regretted that we did so. (A lumber exporter of New Orleans.)

At this time, the beginning of a new year, may we express to you our deep appreciation of the assistance and cooperation we at all times have received from the bureau.

For the past few years our foreign business has been steadily increasing, and at the end of the year when we see our previous figures bettered we naturally feel gratified for the assistance received in our analysis of foreign marketing problems, and in thinking of the various agencies organized to help the American exporter we naturally think first of your bureau.

Needless to say, it is our sincere hope that the work of your bureau will never be curtailed, but, rather, that its scope will be enlarged. We feel you are doing a great service to American manufacturers and only regret that more American firms are not acquainted with the high quality of service which you render. We were very much interested in reading an article recently in The Nation's Business and trust that that article will serve to bring before a greater number of people the important niche that you fill in the field of foreign commerce.

Will you, therefore, accept our thanks for your assistance in the past year, and our sincerest wishes for success in the coming year. (A New York manufacturer of office machines.)

The figures which have been recently published showing the great increase in exports of automotive products last year over any previous year are most gratifying to us.

From my experience in the automotive division, and acquainted as I am with its service, I know that they have contributed toward this increased business; and if I can, without being misinterpreted, I want to express to you and to your associates our thanks and appreciation for the amount which the automotive division of the bureau has contributed to the successful accomplishment of last year. With their continued activity and interest, we hope to be still further assisted by them. (A prominent Michigan manufacturer of motor vehicles.)

We appreciate the splendid cooperation which the Department of Commerce has given us, for we showed over 100 per cent increase in our foreign business in 1925 in comparison with 1924. We attribute this largely to the cooperation received from your department by the names furnished us, whom we circulated, and through this means built up a nice outlet for our products. (A Wisconsin manufacturer of automotive devices.)

It is a great pleasure for me, as well as an obvious duty, to mention the untiring help and consistent cooperation of your department's representative in the Baltic States, Commercial Attaché Carl J. Mayer. This assistance has been of great service to the progress of the loan and other negotiations and evidences the high value of the Department of Commerce under its present able administration to American interests overseas. (A New York banker.)

At this time of the year our thoughts revert gratefully to those whose assistance has helped us. We wish to take this opportunity to thank your bureau for the prompt, courteous, and intelligent manner in which our various inquiries and requests have been attended to. We have bothered you for many things during the year, and you certainly should be complimented upon the manner in which you have attended to our wants. (A New York hardware company.)

Permit us to extend to you at this time and to the other members of your department our expressions of appreciation and sincere thanks for the excellent service rendered. In all cases where we have requested your cooperation it has been given freely and without hesitation. We feel that the value of your office to those engaged in foreign business can not be overestimated, but it is possible that some of us could be a little more generous in giving expression to our gratitude for the service rendered. (A Seattle export company.)

The CHAIRMAN. General debate has expired, and the Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. (a) The Secretary is authorized to appoint officers of the foreign commerce service, but only after eligibility has been determined by examinations held by the Civil Service Commission and the Department of Commerce in coordination, except that the Secretary may, with the approval of the Civil Service Commission, appoint without such examination any person who, prior to the date on which this act takes effect, has served, or has passed an examination for appointment, as commercial attaché, assistant commercial attaché, trade commissioner, division head, assistant trade commissioner, commercial agent, or special agent in the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce.

(b) The Secretary shall appoint each officer of the foreign commerce service to a grade specified in section 1, and to one of the following classes, and shall fix his compensation within the salary range specified for such class: Class 1, $8,000 to $10,000; class 2, $7,000 to $9,000; class 3, $6,000 to $8,000; class 4, $5,000 to $7,000; class 5, $4,000 to $6,000; class 6, $3,000 to $5,000; class 7, below $3,000. In making appointments to a grade and class and in fixing compensation the Secretary shall take into consideration the examination and record of the officer and the post to which assigned.

(c) The Secretary is authorized to promote or demote in grade or class, to increase or decrease within the salary range fixed for the class the compensation of, and to separate from the service officers of the foreign commerce service, but in so doing the Secretary shall take into consideration records of efficiency maintained under his direction.

(d) Any officer of the foreign commerce service may be assigned for duty in the United States for a period of not more than three years without change in grade, class, or salary, or with such change as the Secretary may direct.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOCH: Page 3, after line 23, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"(e) The Secretary of Commerce is authorized, whenever he deems it would be in the public interest, to order to the United States on his statutory leave of absence any foreign commerce officer who has performed three years or more of continuous service abroad: Provided, That the expenses of transportation and subsistence of such officers and their immediate families, in traveling from their posts to their homes in the United States and return, shall be paid under the same rules and regulations applicable in the case of officers going to and returning from their posts under orders of the Secretary of Commerce when not on leave: Provided further, That while in the United States the services of such officers shall be available for trade conference work and for such other duties in the Department of Commerce and elsewhere in the United States as the Secretary of Commerce may prescribe."

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, this simply follows the present practice and is identical with the provisions of the Rogers bill. It was omitted by oversight.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK of Texas: Page 3, strike out all of paragraph (b) and insert in lieu of the matter stricken out the following:

"(b) The Secretary shall appoint each officer of the foreign commerce service to a grade specified in section 1, and to one of the following classes, and shall fix his compensation within the salary range specified for such class: Class 1, $7,500; class 2, $6,000 to $7,000; class 3, $5,000 to $6,000; class 4, $4,000 to $5,000; class 5, $3,000 to $5,000; class 6, $3,000 to $4,500; class 7, below $3,000. In making appointments to a grade and class and in fixing compensation the Secretary shall take into consideration the examination and record of the officer and the post to which assigned."

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Chairman, in the remarks I made in the limited time granted to me by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON], I was about to undertake a comparison between the reclassification act of 1923 for scientific and professional services and the salary grades provided in this bill. As I stated in those remarks, professional and scientific services are the best paid of the classified employees under the reclassification act of 1923. In the amendment that I have offered I have substantially followed the salary grades provided for the professional and scientific service in that reclassification act, for the reason that these foreign-service employees could properly be termed professional and scientific employees. For example, class 1, in the bill before us, the salary is fixed at $8,000 to $10,000. My amendment would provide a salary of $7,500. In class 2 as written in the bill there is provided the salary of $7,000 to $9,000, and my amendment would provide $6,000 to $7,000. In class 3 in the bill the salary ranges from $6,000 to $8,000, and my amendment would provide $5,000 to $6,000. In class 4 the bill provides $5,000 to $7,000, and my amendment would provide $4,000 to $5,000. In class 5 the bill provides a salary range of $4,000 to $6,000, while my amendment provides a salary range from $3,000 to $5,000. In class 6 the bill provides a salary range of from $3,000 to $5,000, and my amendment would provide a range of from $3,000 to $4,000. Class 7 provides a salary range of $3,000 and under, and my amendment would not make any change in that class. What situation do we have? Under the present law the director, the able Doctor Klein, who has been referred to in the debate, is a classified employee under the reclassification act of 1923, and he receives $7,500 per year. If this bill is passed, then class 1 of the employees under his direction will receive a salary of from $9,000 to $10,000 each, as against the salary of $7,500 that the director himself receives. It seems to me that that is an illogical thing to do. It is indefensible. There is no need for it. It is an extravagance which the House can not justify.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Yes.

Mr. HOCH. I do not happen to know, and perhaps the gentleman is correct, in respect to the salary that Doctor Klein receives, but I do know that he is doing what he does to-day at a great financial sacrifice to himself, and to adopt the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Texas would virtually kill this service, because it has been almost impossible to keep at the present salaries the character of men that are needed to do this work effectively.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Let me say this to the gentleman from Kansas—not with reference to Doctor Klein, because I do not know him personally, and he may be all that the gentleman says; but the argument always used is that somebody is serving the Government at a sacrifice. We have now a bill pending before the Committee on the Judiciary to increase the salaries of the Federal judges to $12,500 a year. The argument made is that most of these judges are serving at a sacrifice. Perhaps they are, perhaps they are not; but the matter of Government salaries is certainly not so bad as often pictured. The fellow who is tied to a comfortable, permanent Government salary is often much better situated than his neighbor in private employment. It is all the time represented that we are paying less salaries in the Government service than are being paid in private employment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. To-day the Committee on Banking and Currency had Governor Strong, of the Federal reserve bank, before it, and in the course of his testimony he gave us the figures of the average salary of the clerical employees in the Federal reserve bank in New York City. I was surprised to hear him state that the average salary is $1,500 a year. That, of course, does not include the officers of the bank. It is constantly represented to us that the clerical employees of the Government of the United States are being paid less than they are being paid in private employment, but I think if gentlemen will make a little examination they will find that such is not the case. The average Government employee receives about $1,700 per annum, which is not so bad when compared with other employments.

Gentlemen say that this is a bill that will relieve agriculture by affording wider markets and will help the farmer and will help business. Perhaps it will; perhaps it will not; but at any rate, here is what is happening in Congress. It happened in the last Congress and it will probably happen in the next Congress. Notwithstanding the farmer has a dollar that all will admit is below the purchase level of the professional man, of the laboring man, of the clerical employee, what is this Congress doing and doing every day and every week? Committees of Congress come in here and say that unless we increase this or that Government salary the employee will have a less purchasing wage, and therefore in order to keep him up with the purchasing level we must raise his salary. It would be impossible for me to undertake to trace, and I would not try to trace, these additional expenses to the backs of the farmer. But one thing is certain, some of it gets there. Of one thing we may rest assured, and that is whenever you increase the overhead cost of Government, whenever you increase the overhead cost of industry, whenever you increase the overhead cost of labor, whenever you increase any of these overhead costs that enter into the general cost of living, agriculture pays its part of it, and this widening space in the purchasing power of the farmers' dollar is constantly going on to his disadvantage. These kinds of laws represented by this bill simply add on a little more to his already heavy burden.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Yes.

Mr. JONES. Can the gentleman give any estimate as to the number of new employees and officers authorized by this bill?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I think there are to be no new ones; that the same number of employees are to be retained.

Mr. JONES. There is nothing in the bill that says that, but the bill seems to authorize new employees without number.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Undoubtedly that will be the case, but, of course, Congress would have to provide for any increase in the number by increasing the appropriation for the Foreign Service. We would at least have that measure of control.

Mr. JONES. There is no limit to the organization?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. No; there is not.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us go just a little further. I am not one of those who have been trying to hold out to the farmer of this country the idea that we can increase his prosperity by setting up a board or another aggregation of governmental employees to draw a lot of high salaries. I do not believe you can do it, and I do not intend to try to help him in that way. But I have said to that great agricultural constituency that I have the honor to represent that whenever we can decrease the cost of Government, whenever we can work economy in Government operation and pass on that economy in the form of tax reduction, we can render the farmer in that manner at least some tangible constructive benefit, and I am going to pursue my policy of voting against an increase in these Government salaries. [Applause.]

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes. Is there objection? There was no objection.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOCH] five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, just a word. I agree with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] as to an increase of salaries generally; but as I said a moment ago, this does not involve an increase for more than two or three members of this service, and those are cases where the increase is necessary. I am sure that if the gentleman from Texas had heard these hearings he would have been impressed with the absolute necessity, if we are to maintain the high character of this service, that we must provide salaries like those proposed here. The turnover in the service is so great that they are constantly faced with the difficulty of retaining the kind of men they need if the service is to be carried on effectively.

I wish we had the time to go through the question of the training and the experience of some of these individual men who are engaged in this service, the sort of requirements exacted and examination that is made of them before they can enter the service.

As I stated in my opening remarks, I do not believe there is a higher class of men anywhere, and if anywhere there is a valuable return made to us it is in this service.

I hope the gentleman will not kill the service, because that would be the effect of his amendment.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. HOCH. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Does the gentleman contend that there is a higher standard of qualifications for these employees than for those employees who are classified under the reclassification act of 1923 as scientific and professional men?

Mr. HOCH. I will say that the field from which men of this kind can be selected is much more limited and the requirements very exacting. In addition, those to whom the gentleman refers have retirement provisions and things of that sort that these men do not have, and the conditions in foreign countries, as the gentleman knows, are in many cases much different from those here.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, can we have the amendment reported again?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will again be reported.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Let us have a division, Mr. Chairman. I ask for a division on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 11, noes 54.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. (a) Subject to the requirements of the civil service laws and rules, the Secretary is authorized to appoint, fix the compensation of, promote, demote, and separate from the service such clerks and other assistants for officers of the foreign commerce service as he may deem necessary.

(b) When authorized by the Secretary and in accordance with the regulations of the Civil Service Commission, officers of the foreign commerce service may employ in a foreign country, from time to time, fix the compensation of, and separate from the service such clerical and subclerical assistants as may be necessary.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. BLANTON. This paragraph gives the Secretary the right to lift them up or let them down at will, and pay big salaries or little, as he sees fit. The fate of my colleague's amendment a moment ago, receiving 11 votes with 54 votes against it, shows the utter futility of trying to legislate sensibly at this time and on this occasion, when even the mind of the majority leader and that of the Speaker are undoubtedly elsewhere. They ought to be enjoying themselves with the Vice President. Just now we could not muster more than 11 votes for that good amendment. Thank God, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER], the friend of the farmer, was one of them, so that the quality of the 11 was all right. [Laughter.]

I want to show you what one of the greatest men who ever sat in this body, Claude Kitchin, said on this subject, when the gentleman from Massachusetts, the late Mr. Rogers, our former splendid colleague, was trying to do then what you are doing now, namely, to raise these salaries in the Foreign Service; Mr. Kitchin said:

Mr. Lansing does not ask for it except to permit these secretaries to meet and mingle socially with the kings and queens and monarchs, the princes and the princesses, and the lords and ladies of Europe, and have them tango and kotow—

That is where I got that word "kotow" [laughter]—to have them tango and kotow around with royalty; not to perform their duties in office.

That is what Claude Kitchin, the former great leader of this House, said on January 26, 1920, on a proposition similar to the one now before us.

And that is what you are fixing to do here by this bill, to give our foreign attachés more money to tango and kotow with the princesses of Europe. [Laughter.]

And on that day Claude Kitchin further said:

The only reason in the world which the Secretary of State gives is to enable these secretaries of the ambassadors to go into good society, into "tango" and "ko-tow" society. [Laughter.] You can call this increase of salaries a tango increase.

And Claude Kitchin then called on the Republican leader to help him save the Treasury, for from that same page, 2070 of the Record for January 26, 1920, I quote:

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I know that there are three economists in this House—one the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. Mondell], and one the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], and myself. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Wyoming that here is where he can help me and Mr. BLANTON save some money to the Government.

That was "tango" and "kotow" then. It is "tango" and "kotow" mostly in this bill.

Mr. HOCH. The gentleman's reference, of course, was to the Diplomatic Service, and not to this service.

Mr. BLANTON. But this foreign high-society monkey business has been extended to the commercial attachés.

Mr. HOCH. I doubt whether any of these men would know what the tango is.

Mr. BLANTON. No; because now they do the "Charleston." You go over and watch them in the kind of knee breeches that our other friend from Kansas [Mr. TINCER] described the other day.

Mr. HOCH. I wish the gentleman would keep the distinction clear between the Diplomatic Service and these business men in this service.

Mr. BLANTON. But if these business men are now tangoing and kotowing just like the men in the Diplomatic Service formerly did, you will find them doing the "Charleston" and all other modern dances, just as their diplomatic brethren are doing, and you are furnishing them the extra money with which to do it. It may suit some of you to do this, but the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER] is a wise man. He knows it does not suit the farmers of Iowa, and therefore he was one of the 11 who voted for my colleague's amendment, but we could get only 11 votes, with only 65 Members present. I will tell you what your committee ought to do. You ought to adjourn this House right now and let us get back into a better legislative mood than we are in just now. The present atmosphere is not conducive to sane legislation, and I think the majority leader ought to adjourn us and turn us loose.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] commented upon the marvelous development and future possibilities of my home community of Birmingham. I am with him in what he said. I am happy to be able to agree. That which makes the Birmingham district great is its natural resources—the coal, iron, and other minerals that are there in the hills, the timber, the water, and the climatic conditions, and, of course, the genius and industry of its people. We are peculiarly well situated for the manufacture of iron and steel. It is generally conceded that we can produce it more cheaply there than anywhere in the whole world. We have little need for commercial attachés; our costs of production take care of us. But we think it is only fair that our foreign customers be permitted to sell freely to us, so that they may be able to buy our products.

How different is the case of the constituents of the gentleman from Massachusetts. Their textile industry is confronted with an entirely different situation. They have no fuel and no raw material; their climate is harsh and unfavorable and they are far from the consuming centers. Yet, despite all of those natural obstacles which are inevitably bound to drag them down, they continue to try to operate their cotton mills and to work against the forces of nature. The result is that every year some of their mills are being moved down into the South. His manufacturers of textiles are investing in southern mills the profits which they have been enabled to realize through an unjust and oppressive protective system. No new mills are being built in his section and old ones are being abandoned. But down in the South—where God ordained the mills should be when he made the climate and put the coal and cotton there—new mills are being built all the time. Good sense on the part of his constituents would lead them to close up and move to the South en masse.

I know of nothing which better illustrates the inexorable laws of economics than to compare the situation in the New England textile industry with that of the iron industry in the community in which I live.

All the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] needs to do in order to get a little economic enlightenment is to apply the principles that are at work upon his industries and upon mine to the industries of the world. These economic laws are not applicable only to Massachusetts and to Alabama; they are applicable to the whole world. Peoples of the world, wherever they may be, ought to devote their energies and talents to the production of those things which their natural resources and their genius, their native ability, and their transportation, and other facilities, enable them to produce best; they ought to leave other things alone. They ought to exchange the products which they are able to produce economically for the products which others are better able to produce.

So America ought exchange the things which our genius, industry, and our natural resources enable us to produce cheaply for the products of other parts of the world. We ought not to be guilty of this economic assinnity—and I do not know of any other word that fits the case like that does—of trying to compete with all the world in everything. Apart from climate and resources of nature, the peculiar genius and talent of peoples should be taken into account. There is room in the world for all; there is useful production in which every man may engage. Leave each people to work at the thing for which they are best equipped, each to his own bent. Then let them exchange their products freely and on a fair basis. It would work wonders in production and economy. It would make for civilization and for the peace of the world. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. (a) Any officer of the foreign commerce service designated by the Secretary of Commerce shall, through the Department of State, be regularly and officially attached to the diplomatic mission of the United States in the country in which he is to be stationed. If any such officer is to be stationed in a country in which there is no diplomatic mission of the United States, appropriate recognition and standing, with full facilities for discharging his official duties, shall be arranged by the Department of State. The Secretary of State may reject the name of any such officer if in his judgment the assignment of such officer to the post designated would be prejudicial to the public policy of the United States.

(b) No officer of the foreign commerce service shall be considered as having the character of a public minister.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question or two of the chairman in charge of the bill. In the report accompanying this bill it is said that the commercial attachés are attached to embassies or legations and outrank the trade assistants who are attached to less important offices, evidently meaning the consulates. The bill, however, provides that they shall all be attached to the diplomatic mission. Would the chairman object to inserting at that place, after the word "mission," "or to a consulate?" That is evidently the intention as written in the report.

Mr. HOCH. I am not sure whether the language of the report is technically accurate or not. On the face of it I see no particular objection to the insertion of those words, but I will say this: The committee was advised that the language of this provision was passed upon by the State Department and is entirely satisfactory to them. Without further information I would hesitate, as far as I am concerned and as one member of the committee, to agree to such an amendment in the absence of a suggestion from the State Department, because it is a very delicate subject and they have passed upon this provision and have O. K'd it.

Mr. TEMPLE. If the State Department has passed on it and the gentleman is not mistaken about it, I will not insist on the amendment.

Mr. HOCH. I was so advised by Doctor Klein this morning. I inquired again in order to reassure myself.

Mr. TEMPLE. There is another point bearing on the next sentence of subsection (a) of section 5, which reads as follows:

If any such officer is to be stationed in a country in which there is no diplomatic mission of the United States, appropriate recognition and standing, with full facilities for discharging his official duties, shall be arranged by the Department of State.

What means has the Department of State of communicating with a government with which we have no diplomatic relations?

Mr. HOCH. I do not know just how the Department of State would do that, I will say frankly to the gentleman, but they seemed to think that they could do it, and I do know, as the gentleman knows, that there are several countries with which we have no diplomatic relations.

Mr. TEMPLE. I know of one very notable instance, and that is Russia.

Mr. HOCH. Yes.

Mr. TEMPLE. Is it intended that if the Department of Commerce should appoint such commercial agents for Russia that the Secretary of State shall arrange facilities for them?

Mr. HOCH. No; there is no intention of that.

Mr. TEMPLE. It is mandatory as it stands.

Mr. HOCH. There is no intention of that sort at all.

Mr. TEMPLE. The language would indicate that.

Mr. HOCH. And the gentleman will notice that the last sentence provides that the Secretary of State may reject the name of any such officer if in his judgment the assignment of such officer to the post designated would be prejudicial to the public policy of the United States.

Mr. TEMPLE. He may reject the name of the officer suggested to him and another man may be nominated.

Mr. HOCH. And he can reject the second one, and so on indefinitely.

Mr. TEMPLE. But that would not be in harmony with the spirit of the law.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. If the gentleman will permit, as I understand subdivision (a) of section 5, the whole matter rests with the Secretary of State. If there is any idea on the part of the Department of Commerce of having a representative where there is no diplomatic mission, the Secretary of State must pass upon the matter in the first instance.

Mr. TEMPLE. I do not intend to insist upon the amendment. I understand the State Department reads these discussions and my inquiry will serve my purpose if it calls attention to a matter I hope will not be overlooked.

Mr. MADDEN. Let me ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question if I may.

Mr. TEMPLE. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Suppose, in the great anxiety of the Secretary of Commerce to expand the commercial business of the United States in foreign lands, he should take it into his head to send a commercial attaché to Russia, for example, with which country we have no diplomatic relations. Suppose that matter was submitted to the Secretary of State, with whom would the Secretary of State negotiate in Russia to arrange for the acceptance of the commercial attaché sent by the Secretary of Commerce?

Mr. TEMPLE. I think he would find himself embarrassed in attempting to enter into communication when the channel of communication has been definitely closed.

Mr. MADDEN. The business people of the United States, I take it, are doing more or less business with Russia?

Mr. TEMPLE. Oh, undoubtedly.

Mr. MADDEN. And inasmuch as this is an agency to promote the business of the country and to foster the development of the business of the people of this country, I am wondering whether they would have sufficient influence with the Secretary of Commerce to induce him to send a commercial attaché to a place where we have no diplomatic representation; and if so, what the effect would be on our standing as a nation?

Mr. TEMPLE. I think if such a thing may be done, we should not say that the Secretary shall—that is, must—arrange for appropriate recognition and standing for such commercial attaché.

Mr. MADDEN. Why should we not say "may"?

Mr. TEMPLE. "Shall" is the language of the act.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; I know that.

Mr. TEMPLE. It was said a moment ago that there are a good many countries where we have no diplomatic mission. We have none in Russia, we have none in Abyssinia, and perhaps there are some others—international atoms like the little Republics of San Marino, Andorra, and Lichtenstein—where we have no diplomatic missions. We have such representation, however, in the new countries of Esthonia, Latvia, and Lithuania.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania may be extended five minutes. This is a matter which is worth while discussing. It may save us a lot of trouble later.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who is one of the most ardent students of international law and the Diplomatic and Consular Service, as well as our commercial development, that we have in the House or in the country, think that there should be any such language carried in any bill passed by this House as would even by inference place the responsibility on the Secretary of State of doing a thing which it is impossible for him to do?

Mr. TEMPLE. I at least wanted to call attention to it in the Record. The bill will be taken up, of course, at the other end of the Capitol, and if the State Department is satisfied with it I am.

Mr. MADDEN. That is true, but we ought to be guided by gentleman like the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who has the most comprehensive knowledge of international questions of anybody I have ever come in contact with. I am willing to take his advice and judgment on any matter of that kind.

Mr. MERRITT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEMPLE. Yes.

Mr. MERRITT. If the gentleman will take the first sentence in the section in connection with the last one, I think he will see that under the paragraph no man can be sent anywhere without the joint agreement of the Secretary of Commerce and the Secretary of State, so the complication suggested by the gentleman from Illinois can not occur.

Mr. MADDEN. Then the Secretary of Commerce's attaché is not in complete charge of the development of commerce in foreign lands, but is only one of the few men who are there to consult with other men to see what the other men are going to do.

Mr. MERRITT. No; the Secretary has it called to his attention there is a commercial possibility in Russia or in any other place where we have not a minister or ambassador—

Mr. TEMPLE. What other place is there?

Mr. MERRITT. And he says:

I would like to arrange for the participation of some industry in this country in that business.

Mr. MADDEN. Whom does he say that to?

Mr. MERRITT. He goes to the Secretary of State and states that is what he wants to do, and then asks, "Can you not arrange to get me some communication with that government?"

Mr. MADDEN. How can he if we have no diplomatic relations with that country?

Mr. MERRITT. Then the Secretary of State says yes or no. If he says no, then the Secretary of Commerce can not do it under the language of this paragraph. If he says yes—

Mr. TEMPLE. Allow me to read the language of the paragraph:

If any such officer is to be stationed—

Mr. MERRITT. But he is not to be stationed without the consent of the Secretary of State.

Mr. TEMPLE. Allow me to read the complete sentence:

If any such officer is to be stationed in a country in which there is no diplomatic mission of the United States, appropriate recognition and standing, with full facilities for discharging his official duties, shall be arranged by the Department of State.

Is not that mandatory?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes, but with an "if."

If any such officer is to be stationed in a country in which there is no diplomatic mission of the United States—

Then, according to the latter part of the section—the Secretary of State may reject the name of any such officer—

And so forth.

Mr. MADDEN. It compels him to make an arrangement and then permits him to reject it.

Mr. MERRITT. No; if he does not reject him he must assign him.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, I recognize the impossibility of legislating in a body as large as this, where a great variety of opinions may be expressed, or of extemporizing language that will accurately accomplish the desired result and do nothing more. My purpose has been accomplished by calling attention to a matter that ought to be considered carefully. I shall not offer an amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. I hope the committee will take notice of what the gentleman from Pennsylvania says and, Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. I move that the word "shall" be stricken out and the word "may" be inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is withdrawn and the gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN: Page 4, line 17, after the word "duties" strike out the word "shall" and insert in lieu thereof the word "may."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. (a) Any officer, clerk, employee, or assistant of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, while on duty outside the continental limits of the United States and away from the post to which he is assigned, shall be entitled to receive his necessary traveling expenses and his actual expenses, in an amount not exceeding $10 per day fixed by the Secretary, incurred for subsistence, including, at the discretion of the Secretary, expenses for subsistence for the entire period while attending a trade gathering, congress, or conference, and, in any other case, for the entire period (but not exceeding 60 days) while remaining continuously in any one place, except that the Secretary is authorized to prescribe a per diem allowance not exceeding $8 in lieu of subsistence.

(b) The Secretary may authorize any officer of the foreign commerce service to fix, in an amount not exceeding the allowance fixed for such officer, an allowance for actual subsistence, or a per diem allowance in lieu thereof, for any clerical or subclerical assistant employed by such officer under subdivision (b) of section 4.

(c) Any such officer, clerk, employee, or assistant, while on duty within the continental limits of the United States, shall be entitled to receive the traveling expenses and actual expenses incurred for subsistence, or per diem allowance in lieu thereof, authorized by law.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 6, strike out line 6 and through the word "Secretary" in line 7, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "expense incurred by subsistence of per diem allowance in accordance with law."

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, I will say that this provision with reference to per diem puts it under existing law. The reason for that is that while there is great need for that there is pending before the House a bill introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] which seeks to put all of these persons on a uniform basis, and the committee is desirous of cooperating and does not wish to complicate it.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from New Jersey, chairman of the Committee on Civil Service, has a bill under consideration which has been given exhaustive study, and I would like to have him make a statement in regard to it.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say in explanation of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas that there have been three bills providing for uniform travel and per diem allowance given consideration by the Civil Service Committee. One was introduced by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BORG], who subsequently introduced a measure to take the place of the original bill, and a third bill introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. The committee has held extensive hearings on the subject and heard from every department of the Government. Various bills and suggestions have been given scrutiny by the subcommittee, and it is prepared to report to the full committee, and it is expected that the Civil Service Committee will to-morrow report to the House a measure which deals comprehensively and conclusively with the service in all parts of the world, both foreign and domestic. For that reason it is not desirable that the limit should be carried in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 12, after the word "place," strike out down to and through the word "subsistence," in line 14.

Mr. HOCH. The purpose of that amendment is to make the section conform to the action already taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the amendments with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CHINBLOM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3858) to establish in the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce of the Department of Commerce a Foreign Commerce Service of the United States, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the previous question having been ordered, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold that for a moment?

Mr. BLANTON. No; the hour of 2.30 having arrived.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 78, noes 9.

So a call of the House was ordered.

The doors were closed.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this roll 273 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not the Chair will put them engross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion to recommit, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLACK of Texas moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and report the same back forthwith with an amendment reading as follows: Page 3, strike out all of paragraph (b) and insert in lieu of the matter stricken out:

"(b) The Secretary shall appoint each officer of the foreign commerce service to a grade specified in section 1 and to one of the following classes, and shall fix his compensation within the salary range specified for such class: Class 1, $7,500; class 2, $6,000 to $7,000; class 3, $5,000 to $6,000; class 4, $4,000 to $5,000; class 5, $3,000 to $4,000; class 6, $3,000 to $4,500; class 7, below $3,000. In making appointments to a grade and class and in fixing compensation the Secretary shall take into consideration the examination and record of the officer and the post to which assigned."

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to recommit offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLACK of Texas) there were—ayes 32, noes 153.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote upon the ground that there is no quorum present, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and thirty-eight Members present, a quorum.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands the yeas and nays. As many as favor ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Nineteen gentlemen have risen, not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused.

So the motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SENATE BRIDGE BILLS ON THE SPEAKER'S TABLE

The SPEAKER. The Speaker has on his desk four Senate bills, S. 1884, to authorize the department of public works, division of highways, of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts to construct a bridge across Palmer River; S. 1804, extending the time for the construction of the bridge across the Mississippi River in Ramsey and Hennepin Counties, Minn., by the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway; S. 2288, granting the consent of Congress to the South Park commissioners and the commissioners of Lincoln Park, separately or jointly, their successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across that portion of Lake Michigan lying opposite the Chicago River, Ill.; and S. 2742, to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Fox River in Kane County, Ill. Similar House bills to these have been passed. Without objection, these Senate bills will be indefinitely postponed.

There was no objection.

LIGHTHOUSE SERVICE

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 10860) to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to dispose of certain lighthouse reservations and to increase the efficiency of the Lighthouse Service, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York calls up the bill (H. R. 10860) in respect to the Lighthouse Service. This bill is on the Union Calendar. The House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10860, with Mr. CHINDBLOM in the chair. The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule one hour of general debate on this bill is allowed, of which the time is to be controlled one-half by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARKER] and one-half by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN].

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] is opposed to the bill, and I think he ought to control the time, and I relinquish the control of the time in his favor.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, the Lighthouse Service has acquired a great deal of property throughout the country. As conditions have changed that property is not useful for lighthouse purposes. This bill simply conveys this property now belonging to the Government to various municipalities and States for park purposes, reserving always the right to retake the property at any time for Federal purposes. The Lighthouse Commissioner assures us that the passage of the bill will probably save the Government many thousands of dollars in upkeep. For instance, in the city of Cleveland there is a lighthouse right in the center of the business part of the city.

There is an authorization here for this property to be sold, and also an authorization for the Committee on Appropriations to appropriate $60,000 to build a lighthouse where it will be valuable. This property will bring more than $60,000. It involves no outlay on the part of the Government, but the Budget recommended that we authorize a specific appropriation rather than have a revolving fund.

There are a few administrative propositions in the bill which I think can be discussed very much better under the five-minute rule. I know that you gentlemen are tired, and I trust we shall not have to use the whole hour in general debate.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask to be recognized in opposition to the bill.

I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARKER] ought to take up a little more of his time in explaining the provisions of the bill. I do not think that burden ought to be cast on me. The strange situation is presented in that numerous features of the bill are not so much as referred to by the gentleman in charge. The House is given no idea from the few words the gentleman from New York has said as to what the bill is really about. I am not intending to reflect on the remarks of the gentleman, but evidently he is more concerned with expedition than he is with imparting light to the Members of the House. I feel as if the House ought to know what is in the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman ought to understand that this is a lighthouse bill.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. It ought not to be incumbent on those opposed to the bill to furnish all the light.

Mr. PARKER. It will be debated fully under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The only proper time to explain a bill is at the beginning. But if I must, of course I must. If nobody else will do it, I will assume the duty of telling the House what the bill is about. I hope that the House will preserve order. I do not want to have to strain my voice in performing this function that belongs to somebody else.

In the first place, this is an omnibus bill. It carries a great many incongruous propositions. Only one of its purposes was disclosed by the remarks of the gentleman from New York. He told you that the Lighthouse Service has some land which it does not need any longer and proposes to turn it over to States and municipalities. To my mind that is the slightest part of what this bill is intended to do. It includes that subject; that is true; and most of the space in the bill, if you measure it with a yardstick, relates to that subject. However, it has numerous other aspects.

For instance, subsection 7 of the bill proposes to convey to private parties for a nominal consideration certain land owned by the Lighthouse Service. That is a complete departure from the other subjects of the bill. That is the kind of a matter which properly should have been made the subject of a private bill. It is to quiet title in private parties to some land which is probably in dispute between them and the Government. I hope that Members will take occasion to read the bill and see just what it does purport to do.

Now, as to the numerous other sections, there is a proposal to convey to various municipalities and States for other public purposes tracts of land of various sizes and in various locations, such conveyances to be made without cost. In other words, we are here donating Government property to certain municipalities and to States. What this land is worth nobody knows. In some instances we have a very slight idea as to its extent. Some of it may have great value. Of course, we reserve the right in the bill—a right I insisted on with tears in my eyes, and finally succeeded in getting the committee to accord—the right to reclaim the land at any time the Government may need it. But obviously that is a right that will probably never be exercised. You know when the Government parts with possession of land and it is used by a municipality as a park there is but the remotest possibility that the Government will ever take it back. We are giving away land, public assets, that probably cost the Government money, and we are getting nothing in return.

The talk that it is expensive to the Government to keep this land requires a very considerable stretch of the imagination. We could walk off and leave it. We do not need to spend a cent on it for a thousand years if we do not want to. It will not cost the Government a cent to keep it if we do not feel obliged to improve it. Therefore the idea that the Government should give it away as a measure of economy is based, as I say, on a wide stretch of the imagination.

I doubt if it is good policy for the Government to give away to any State or city property that belongs to it. It seems to me that a proper responsiveness to our duty as trustees for the people of the United States in holding this property would require us to have this land appraised and sell it for a fair market price and let whoever wants it buy it. That is what I would do if it were my own private property. That is what I would do if I were a director of a corporation owning this property. But it seems that there is no closed season with Uncle Sam. The idea is to get out of him anything you can. It is a question of influence. I do not think our duty rests more lightly upon us as Members of Congress than it would as managers of a private corporation or of private property.

If I were the guardian of an orphan who owned this land, I would not give it away; if I were the administrator of an estate or the executor of a will, I certainly could not reconcile the giving away of this land with my duty. The time has come, it seems to me, when we ought to respond to our obligation to the Government with some degree of fidelity and to the same extent that we would to a private obligation or to one imposed upon us in some other capacity. Congressmen are not supposed to have consciences, of course, and are not expected to do businesslike things, and it is because the public feels that way that Congress stands so low in public estimation. A little more businesslike methods in Congress and a little more dealing with public affairs in a businesslike way would gain for us more of the respect of the people and would make Congress as an institution more worthy not only of regard but of influence.

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. LOZIER. In principle is there any difference between donating this Government property to these cities and passing a bill donating from the United States Treasury an amount equivalent to the value of this property?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. It is exactly the same proposition.

Mr. LOZIER. Is it not a subsidy?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. It is a gift of the value of the property. The only qualification that could possibly be conceived is that the Government reserves the nominal and formal right to retake this property if it should need it at some time in the future.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. The gentleman will recall that the War Department had certain property which it did not need and this House authorized the sale of that property, and up to date the sale of a part of that property has brought some $7,000,000,000 into the Treasury of the United States. Does not the gentleman think that the Treasury Department should pursue the same policy in regard to its property as the War Department pursued as to its property and get some return from this property?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I think that is sound. I also remember that the War Department and the Navy Department turned over to the States, through the Department of Agriculture, vast quantities of trucks and road implements and material all free of charge. They gave it away; and I also remember how the States took little care of that property and realized little benefit from it.

But the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL] must remember that had we put those trucks on the market and sold them it would have been in competition with private business, and that there are a lot of influential truck manufacturers in this country who want their business promoted instead of having it competed with.

Mr. McSWAIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. McSWAIN. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that a few years ago this House donated the Fort McHenry property—where the song "The Stars and Stripes" was written—to the city of Baltimore, and that during the last two or three years the city of Baltimore has been trying to get Congress to take it back and maintain it as a park for the use of that city.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I have no doubt that the people who are the beneficiaries under this bill would be perfectly willing to have the Government retain those lands if we would undertake to develop them as parks for their use. I have no doubt they would be glad to come in on that basis. It so happens that in these particular cases they have expressed a willingness to take the land as it is. We do not have to lubricate the proposition in any way for them, but it may be that they, like the city of Baltimore, will come back later and ask that we develop and improve the lands.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. Does the gentleman know how many cities and municipalities will get the benefit of this bill?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. There are all told about six, as I understand. Unfortunately not one of these is my city. One of the rules which I adopted when I entered this House was that I had to have a share of the spoil when I helped to roll in a pork barrel. I am not going to roll any pork barrel unless there is something for me in the barrel. The chances are that if they had offered to donate two or three hundred acres of land in the suburbs of my city on which my people could disport themselves, as they have in these instances, I would have been found supporting the bill, and in consequence of my success in fleeing Uncle Sam have been elected to Congress for several terms on the strength of that generosity. [Laughter.]

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I would like to ask the gentleman whether it is not true that there are several parcels of land carried in this bill that are to be transferred from one department of the Government to another, so that they can be used for better purposes than at the present time?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes; but I do not refer to those instances and they are not included in the number I gave.

We are in the strange situation, gentlemen, that you can not take your hand out of one pocket and put it in another of your own pockets without an act of Congress. That shows how elastic our Government is. Here is the Lighthouse Service, that does not need some of its land, and the War Department, that does need it, and it takes all of this machinery of an act of Congress to turn over the land to the other department.

Now, then, to proceed to another point. This subsection 7 donates to private parties a piece of land said to be about an acre. I would like for you gentlemen who have the bill before you to read the report of the committee. And, I will say in passing, that no hearings were held on this bill. We had a report submitted to us from the Lighthouse Service. What responsibility was back of the report I have not the slightest idea; but on that meager information that you will find here in the committee report will be found absolutely everything the committee knows about this bill and about its subjects.

Mr. McDUFFIE. If the gentleman will permit, the gentleman does not mean to refer to section 7 of the bill.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I think the gentleman is referring to paragraph 7 and not section 7. Section 7 seems to deal with lights in aid of navigation on the Allegheny River.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I refer to line 9, on page 5. It is numbered 7. It may not be a separate section; probably it is not, but that is not material.

I was just going to say with reference to that matter that here is an acre of land near Cleveland, Ohio, exactly where it is I do not know, and how valuable it is I do not know. I do not know anybody who does know. No information was given to the committee on the subject. The report of the committee which shows all the committee knows on the subject and was copied from a statement made by some one in the Lighthouse Service, I do not know who, says this:

This property, consisting of about 1 acre, has been occupied for two or three generations by Joel Norton and descendants. They appear to have occupied the property in good faith and have paid taxes on it. If it were not for the fact that the prescriptive right does not operate against the United States, these people would now have a valid title derived from long occupation without any adverse claims. The reservation is no longer required for lighthouse purposes, and it is considered equitable to confirm title in the heirs of Joel Norton for a nominal consideration.

Now, why give this land away? What is the equity and what is the equity based on? So far as I know, and so far as anybody else knows that is known to me, here is a man who got on some land that belonged to the Government of the United States. He stayed there for two or three generations. How long that may be I leave to people who are better versed in the length of a generation than I am to say—maybe 20, maybe 40 years; I have not the slightest idea. But he went there and he had the use of it through all these years, and now because he was so considerate as to use it during all these years we propose to give it to him. That is the equity back of this proposition. What the land is worth nobody knows. We did not hear any evidence. Nobody came before us. All the committee knows is just what you find in this report. The land may be worth $1 or it may be worth $100,000, so far as I know.

Mr. PARKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes; certainly.

Mr. PARKER. Did not the subcommittee have hearings on this bill?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. No; not that I know of.

Mr. PARKER. I think the gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I will state to the gentleman what my understanding on that point is; if I am in error, I wish to be corrected. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT] was on a subcommittee appointed to consider a number of bills. He asked the Lighthouse Service for a report, and what they quote here in the committee report was the response, and that is all Mr. MERRITT or any Member knows, so far as I know. He never told us anything more about it. We had it up in the committee in his presence, and if he knew anything more about it he kept it in the recesses of his bosom. I assume that if he had had any further information he would have given it to us.

Now, why should this provision—subsection 7—be in this bill? What has it got to do with the balance of the bill? Not a thing on earth. A lot of separate bills were referred to our committee; they embraced the various subjects dealt with by this bill and other subjects. It was considered strategic for parliamentary reasons to melt them into one and shove them into the House with the idea you could get a dozen bills through in that way just as easy as you could one. One of them was no worse than the other and they were all bad. That must have been the ground on which the action was based. They are certainly incongruous.

Quieting a private individual's title without complete knowledge of the facts! It is said he claimed and held Government property in good faith. How do I know there was any good faith about his occupancy? How do I know the Government will not need this land in future? We have got the word of just one man, and I do not even know who the man is, and I do not know how high he is in the Lighthouse Service or what his authority is. We are trusting him absolutely in all these matters. If he is an honest man and a capable man, good. If he is a crook or if he is incapable, we are ruined. We are dealing with this important subject when we have not any real information about it.

Well, comment is unnecessary. I have stated the facts.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Is the gentleman from Alabama against the bill?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I am. I certainly have been speaking to mighty poor account if I have not yet got it over to the gentleman that I am against it.

Mr. MADDEN. I was not quite sure. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I am glad the gentleman asked me the question. I want to make it perfectly clear even to the most rudimentary intelligence that I am against the bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mine does not even approach that. I am glad the gentleman says he is against the bill because now I may understand what the gentleman is trying to get at. I would like to ask the gentleman whether there have been any hearings on this bill or not?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. No; not a real hearing.

Mr. MADDEN. Do I understand the gentleman to say the bill's only sponsor is the head of the Lighthouse Service?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I do not know whether he is the head or not. I would be glad for the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT] to tell us about that.

Mr. PARKER. If the gentleman will permit—

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will not the gentleman allow the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT] to tell about that in his time?

I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask that question because I think it is quite important.

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Chairman, these matters being all matters of detail within the knowledge of the Lighthouse Bureau and not within the knowledge of anyone else, our committee, being overloaded with work, thought it would conserve time by appointing a subcommittee. The committee appointed a subcommittee consisting of myself as chairman, Governor SHALLENBERGER, Mr. PHILLIPS, and two others as members of the subcommittee.

This subcommittee heard Mr. Putnam, head of the Lighthouse Bureau. All of the facts here are not matters of opinion but matters of record in the bureau.

Mr. MADDEN. The ownership and location of the property?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. And the obsolescence of the lighthouse purposes, is that a matter of record also?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes. All matters of record, and any man can see from the statement of a man like Mr. Putnam, a man of unimpeachable character, what the facts are. If you will read the report, I think you will see that there is no doubt about the propriety of disposing of it.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the disposition of this property involve the purchase of other property?

Mr. MERRITT. No. Here is the fact. None of this property is given to anyone. Under the provisions of the bill every piece of property not sold for cash is given under a revocable license, whereby the town or State makes use of the property until the Government wants it, and in that case it comes back to the Government.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the bill place any limitations on the purpose for which the property can be used?

Mr. MERRITT. It is for park purposes; and if the property is not used for that purpose, it comes back automatically.

Mr. MADDEN. Is there any obligation on the part of the Government to spend any money for its beautification or upkeep?

Mr. MERRITT. No. As a matter of fact, the Government saves two or three thousand dollars a year, because they give up the maintenance of the lights and put in an automatic beacon.

Mr. MADDEN. Who puts in the beacon?

Mr. MERRITT. The United States. Take the first section up at Lake Champlain. There is an old lighthouse which the State of New York rebuilt. It is proposed to give it to the State of New York. The Government will save under the re-vocable license, because the automatic light only costs $300 a year, while the other light with a keeper costs $1,000 a year.

Mr. MADDEN. That is good business. What is the total value of the property involved here?

Mr. MERRITT. Well, that is problematical.

Mr. McSWAIN. I do not see in the report any statement that it is worth any sum.

Mr. MERRITT. There is some property in Michigan which is sand dunes on the shore of the lake, and they have no commercial value whatever.

Mr. McSWAIN. Copper under them?

Mr. MERRITT. The State wants to get control of it, so that they will not be sold. They want to keep that property intact.

Mr. MADDEN. That is becoming the most valuable for park purposes. People like to wallow in the sand instead of wallowing in the mud.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. May I ask the gentleman if there were hearings held before the subcommittee and statements reduced to writing? There are no printed hearings. Did any witnesses testify before the subcommittee, and was their testimony reduced to writing?

Mr. MERRITT. I think the only witness we had was Mr. Putnam and his assistant. Their statements are in writing in the records of the department.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I notice that the report includes something which purports to be quoted matter, and it is my understanding that that was a statement made by Mr. Putnam.

Mr. MERRITT. That is right.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. That is all there was to it. And the committee knows nothing about it except what is set forth in the report?

Mr. MERRITT. That is practically correct.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON].

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, there are two items in this bill about which I am very well posted. No. 7 is a tract situated on Cunningham Creek, Ohio, which is in my district. Years ago the lighthouse was abandoned. There is no one of the younger generation that remembers the time when the lighthouse was on that site. In the last Congress a special bill was passed in the House authorizing a quitclaim deed to the heirs of Joel Norton. The bill passed the Senate also, but in some way was lost in the shuffle at the end of the session. The value of the property would be perhaps two or three hundred dollars. It has been occupied by several generations of this family for 60 years.

Item 13 authorizes the sale and conveyance by quitclaim deed to the highest bidder, after due advertisement, upon such terms as the Secretary of Commerce may deem for the best interests of the United States, the lighthouse property located on West Ninth Street and Main Avenue, in the city of Cleveland, with the keepers' dwellings and other improvements thereon. I can remember that lighthouse from the time when I was a very small boy. It is now no longer useful as a lighthouse, as the lights are located on the breakwater and piers on a level with the lake.

This is on high ground. It is, however, used for quarters for lighthouse keeper—some four families—and it is in a business district. The land is of value altogether out of keeping with that which would naturally be devoted to the use of lighthouse quarters. It can probably be sold for from $75,000 to $100,000 and adequate quarters furnished for the families for a much less sum. Consequently, as it is no longer needed as lighthouse quarters and as those who occupy it can be provided with quarters at a much less price than the property could be sold for, as stated in the report, it is desirable to dispose of it. For those two items certainly I can vouch.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT] a question. I notice on page 9 the following language, in section 2, respecting these proposed gifts of land by the Government—shall be subject to the express condition that the grantee assume the obligations imposed by such paragraph, including carrying out the purposes of the grant.

But the date when the grantee shall assume the carrying out of that obligation is by the next sentence left entirely to the Secretary of Commerce, for it merely provides that the Secretary of Commerce may at "any time"—"any time" means 10 days or 10 weeks or 10 years—send a notice when the grantee shall begin to carry out that obligation. There is no definite time fixed. Now, it is customary in deeds of a revocable kind to provide not only that the grantee shall assume the obligations imposed by the deed but also to fix definitely the date when its possible revocation shall occur by a provision that if such grantee does not begin or resume the performance of such obligation within a certain period from and after the delivery of the deed the property shall, upon the expiration of such period, revert to the grantor without further notice or demand or any suit or proceeding.

That is the way the deed should read. It would not require any further act by Congress or by any official. The date of the possible revocation would be fixed definitely. But this section merely provides that the grantee need not begin the performance of the obligations imposed by the paragraph until the Secretary of Commerce shall send the grantee a notice, and this he may send at "any time," and he may delay it for years.

Mr. MERRITT. The difference between the two propositions is that the gentleman is talking about a deed, while this is a mere license.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But the same principle would apply, whether to license or deed, if the Government's interest is to be protected and if there is a condition that the land is to be devoted to park purposes.

Mr. MERRITT. The point is that with some of these properties it is not necessary to do anything at all; you want to leave them alone, and the property that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] is speaking about, they do not want to do anything with. The object of this bill is to grant these communities whatever benefits come from the use of these properties, which are of no value to the United States, but at the same time to hold them in case they shall be of value to the United States and leave the United States free to take them over again.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes, but in the license, if you call it a license—I think it is to be a deed—you ought expressly to declare in the language of this section, beginning in line 14—and if such grantee—

And if this is a "grantee," then it must be a deed—and if such grantee does not begin or resume the performance of such obligations within a period of six months from the date of the delivery of the deed.

And so forth. The date for the revocation ought not to be left to the uncontrolled discretion of any Government official. When the Government conveys land to a person by a deed with a clause declaring the purpose for which the land must be used, the deed itself ought to specify the date when, if the condition be not performed, the deed shall be considered revoked.

Mr. MERRITT. The committee did not think that.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is the only way to protect the Government, because if you leave it to the discretion of an executive officer, he might not send the notice in five years. He might not send it at all.

Mr. MERRITT. If he is a faithful officer he will look after the interests of the United States.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Was Fall a faithful officer?

Mr. MERRITT. I do not know about that.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. This is a Government of law, not of men, and it ought to be in the law itself.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan rose.

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, on page 8, subdivision (12), there is provision for the transfer to the State of Michigan of portions of two lighthouse reserves. I am quite familiar with them. As to the conditions on which transfer is to be made, the bill says they are to be transferred to the State of Michigan "on such terms and conditions as to providing means of access to the light stations and the Coast Guard station," and so on, "as the Secretary of Commerce shall determine." These places are isolated, largely sand dunes on the shore of Lake Michigan. One of them is difficult of access. I believe the usual means is by boat. When I talked with the Assistant Secretary of Commerce about these lands, told him our State wishes to acquire them for park purposes, and asked him to make a favorable report to the Congress, he referred me to the Superintendent of the Lighthouse Service. I talked with the superintendent, and found him desirous of imposing a condition that the State of Michigan must construct and maintain highways to these places and over them to the stations. I said that the State of Michigan contemplates the construction of highways to and over these places of resort for our people and for tourists.

Mr. MADDEN. Was this a voluntary surrender of the property by the department or was it done at the solicitation of the State?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I first suggested to officials of the department that transfer to the State should be made. It was, of course, voluntary on their part, because determination of the matter was, in the first instance, entirely in their hands. I had looked over the properties, had communicated with the superintendent of parks of our State, and had him visit them. He wrote me that the State would like to acquire them, and I took up the matter with the Department of Commerce to see whether or not a favorable report might be made on a bill that I would introduce to provide for transfer of title. As far as information respecting these properties are concerned, as to whether or not the subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce acquired information to enable it intelligently to report this bill to the House, when I talked with the Superintendent of Lighthouses I found him fully informed; he knew more about them than I did, although I live in the immediate vicinity of the properties. It was from him, I believe, that the subcommittee obtained its information. I have said that the State of Michigan contemplates construction of highways to and over these properties.

I said to the Superintendent of Lighthouses and to the Assistant Secretary of Commerce, "The State intends to build roads, but I do not wish you to fix an early or definite time, because the State will ultimately, soon I hope, build, carrying out its general plan of construction of highways to enable travelers to reach these and other State parks. Make such conditions as you think are proper and necessary, and if the State does not wish, or is unable to comply with them, it will, of course, refuse to accept the lands."

Then as to the provision for six months, as the bill says, I am not sure but that the provision was inserted as the result of my conference with the Commissioner of Lighthouses. I told him that the State intends at an early date to construct these highways, but if the Secretary of Commerce would serve notice on the State now, immediately on the enactment of this law, and hold it responsible and refuse to execute a conveyance or would take away the property after the conveyance because the State does not promptly comply, that would be a hardship and would defeat the purpose of the law, so far as these particular properties are concerned. So he said:

Well, suppose we withhold the notice as long as we think is proper, and then give the State notice, and if it does not comply with the notice within six months the land shall revert to the Federal Government.

I think that is the reason for the insertion of that provision in section 2, found on page 9. And so far as these particular properties are concerned, I think that is a reasonable provision.

Now these lands have for many, many years been lighthouse reserves, and not subject to sale; hence no one knows what they are worth or what they would bring on a sale. But immediately adjoining, and practically a part of one of them, is a homestead tract owned by the Federal Government, subject to homestead entry since homestead laws were first written on the statute books, and nobody wanted them; and alongside of them, near them, is some of the finest farming land in the State of Michigan, occupied and cultivated for generations. If this land had been worth anything, it could have been taken up as a homestead and acquired at no cost. Now, from what I have said you can judge of the money value of these properties to the Federal Government.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The Government is giving away real estate for park purposes. If a private individual were giving it away for that beneficial purpose, he would be sure to put in the deed a clause providing that if the grantee did not, within six or eight months or one year—some definite period—from the delivery of the deed, begin performance of that obligation the title shall revert to the grantor or his heirs. Now, ought the Government of the United States to give away real estate for park purposes and not say anything at all definite in the deed concerning the revocation? Ought not the deed to read that if the municipality does not within 10 months or one year begin performance of the obligation it shall revert to the Government?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I think if our Government were dealing with property of any considerable value, or if it were dealing with private individuals, all precautions the gentleman from Wisconsin suggests ought to be taken and perhaps written into this bill. But here is one government dealing with another government. Here it is passing money, if there is any value here, from one pocket to another, and as far as these Michigan properties are concerned I think the provisions of the bill are satisfactory and safeguard the interests of the Government. The bill says that the lands are to be disposed of to the State "on such terms and conditions as the Secretary of Commerce shall determine." Now, if the conditions are not complied with—

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Would you give that power to Mr. Fall?

Mr. MERRITT. What could Mr. Fall have done that would have hurt the United States in that case?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. He would not with my vote have had a chance.

If I were giving away my property and wanted it to revert to me in the event it should not be used for public-park purposes, I would so state in the deed and definitely fix a time for revocation. I am a trustee, and in dealing with the property of my cestui que trust it is my duty to be as careful as I would if the property were my own.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I think the Government of the United States can deal more leniently and should deal more liberally with a State than with an individual, or than one individual could deal with another. As to Mr. Fall, I have no more use for him than you have. But I do not think any of the officials of the State of Michigan who will have to do with this matter will try to corrupt the Federal Government or any of its officials.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman is aware of the fact, to quote a hackneyed phrase, that this is a Government of law and not of men. There is a governor of a State now in the penitentiary for 10 years for forgery and perjury. What reason has the gentleman for his trust of men who happen to receive a majority vote in a State? I repeat with Jefferson that "governments are founded in distrust of human nature," and as trustees it is our duty to protect in every way within our power the property of our cestui que trust as if we were dealing with our own property.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. If my time has not expired and I have the floor, I will yield to the gentleman from North Dakota.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. CROSSER rose.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, how does the time stand?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has two minutes remaining. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] has control of the time on the minority side.

Mr. PARKER. I suggest to the gentleman from Alabama to go ahead. I will put the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER] on last.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I invite anyone who wants to act intelligently on this bill to read the committee report. He will find that it is composed almost altogether of quoted matter. The quoted matter is a communication which came from the Lighthouse Service and that is all the information that anybody on the committee or in the House has concerning this bill, unless he has some private knowledge derived from the outside. That is what I charged a few minutes ago, and the colloquy which has occurred rivets it and makes it perfectly clear that I was not in error.

Now, with reference to the piece of real estate in Cleveland, Ohio. We are authorizing, by subdivision 13, on page 8, the Secretary of Commerce to advertise that property and sell it to the highest bidder on such terms as he may think proper. That is the extent to which the Government's interest is being protected by this bill. There is no upset price and no provisions for appraisement. The Secretary of Commerce is given absolute discretion. He can sell it for $1 down and $1 a month for the balance of his life, with interest or without interest.

The bill provides that he may sell it upon such terms as he may deem for the best interests of the Government. In other words, we leave the matter entirely to his discretion. I submit that is a method of disposing of real estate that no intelligent business man would ever adopt. It can not be defended by anybody who has any regard for business principles. I have seen lots of sales to the highest bidder. They are sometimes advertised in a perfunctory way and possibly few know anything about them. A few fellows who are interested go in together and each agrees he will not bid against the other, or they bid it up to where they think it is safe and then it is knocked down. This property may be sold for a quarter of a dollar, so far as the authority contained in this bill is concerned.

Mr. MERRITT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I can not yield now.

Mr. MERRITT. I would like to give the gentleman some information.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The gentleman has passed that point. I am sorry, but I have not the time to yield, because there are several other matters in the bill which should be discussed.

Mr. MERRITT. I want to ask the gentleman if he is aware that the Secretary of Commerce under existing law has full authority to sell all of this property if he wants to do so?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. If so, why are you asking for this legislation?

Mr. MERRITT. Because we do not want to have it sold.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. You are asking that we give him authority to do something he already has the right to do, so you say. If we are doing that we are stultifying ourselves. But I think it is quite likely that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT], although perfectly sincere and frank, is mistaken. I imagine that the reason for this bill being in the House lies in the fact that we are authorizing the Secretary of Commerce to do something that he has not the right to do now.

I have devoted nearly all of my time to telling you about these land deals but they are just a part of the bill. There are three or four other sections in the bill more deadly than the land sections. The worst we can do as to the land is just to give it away, but these other provisions in the bill will yoke onto the neck of the Government certain laws which may plague us long into the future. Take, as an illustration, the retirement provisions for employees of the Lighthouse Service. I have not the time to comment on that section, but I ask gentlemen to read section 3 of the bill.

And I ask gentlemen who may want to vote like a real Congressman, and not like a sheep jumping over a fence, to read section 4 of the bill. It gives the Secretary of Commerce the right to pay any employee of the Lighthouse Service for any property he may lose or which may be damaged at stations or on vessels of the Lighthouse Service or in transit. An employee of the Lighthouse Service traveling or stationed in the performance of his duties can have a trunk loaded with his goods and if it is damaged by a railroad collision or if it is lost or destroyed he has the right to require the Government to pay him for it. And are we expected to pay, as in the case of soldiers and sailors, merely for equipment lost?

Oh, no. He can have almost anything he wants in the trunk. He can have jewelry, or works of art, or almost anything else that he wants in the trunk, and if it is lost or damaged the Federal Government has got to pay. And has got to pay him without the judgment of a court but simply upon his claim as made to the Secretary of Commerce; in short, we are simply opening up the door to petty graft by such a provision.

Mr. BURTNESS. Has not the gentleman overlooked the amendment that was written in the bill in that regard?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I must decline to yield. I have the laboring oar; I have to do the work of both sides and explain the bill, and oppose it also, so I have not the time to yield. If I had the time I would be glad to yield to everybody, but I have not even the time to explain all of the features of this bill. If I attempted to do that it would take me a long time.

It is absurd that we should be undertaking to legislate in such a fashion. Here is an omnibus bill, including numerous incongruous subjects not related in the slightest degree. It is put out in this fashion, merely for the purpose of parliamentary strategy. Are we going to vote for it? Well, not I. If I were not bound to respond to the obligation I assumed here in the well of the House to protect the interests of the United States; if I were blind and oblivious to that, at least I would have some regard for my reputation for intelligence and for the record which I am making for my people back home.

Now, if I have any more time I will yield to anyone who wants to ask me anything.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington and Mr. CROWTHER rose.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I yield first to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. My understanding is the Secretary of Commerce has authority to sell this land now, but does not have authority to give it away until we pass this bill.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. He will have authority to practically give it away if we pass this bill.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes; but he has not the authority now to do that. I would like to know something about Fernandina, Fla., if the gentleman from Alabama or the gentleman from Florida can tell us about that.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN] has as much right to be given land for a park next to Fernandina as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] for a park for his constituents. Both of them I admire very much, and each should come in on the same basis as the other. If you are going to give away the Government's land, it does not make any difference how much it is worth nor what the Government paid for it, nor does it make any difference what the Government wants to do with it. The whole question is, Does some State or municipality want to use it for park purposes? If so, give it to them.

The Government has near the edge of my district several thousands acres of valuable coal land. I think I will conceive the idea of establishing a public park in that section of the country and invite the Government to donate that land to my city or my county or my State; then having gotten possession of it we will be in shape to chaffer with the Government when it comes to the matter of getting the minerals out of it. Is there any minerals on the land covered by this bill? I do not know. Has it any other value? I do not know, and nobody here knows.

I yield now to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CROWTHER. Four hundred and twenty acres of land in Florida at present valuation ought to be nearly enough money to run the Government for a year.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I do not think we ought to single out the Florida donation for criticism. May I say to the gentleman if this bill is bad at all, it is bad in principle. It is not a question of where the land lies nor what it is worth. The question is whether we are going to stand on principle and act like business men in discharging our functions as trustee for the people of the United States, or are we going to just roll out a pork barrel here and let him get something out of it who can.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER].

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Chairman, in harmony with the doctrine which has been invoked so much recently, it seems to me proper to call attention to the fact that six pieces of the property referred to, are to be transferred either to States or subdivisions of States. We have heard a great deal about local self-government, State rights, and all that sort of thing. If that principle be sound, then I do not think we are committing any serious wrong in allowing these States and the one city to have the property and to use it, especially in view of the fact we can take it back without the consent of the grantees at any time we see fit. The transfers of six parcels of land enumerated in this bill are to be made to States. Four other tracts are simply transferred from one department of the Government to another—a mere formality necessary for technical reasons.

One of the remaining two items included in the bill relates to the property in Cleveland to which my colleague, Mr. BURTON, referred a few moments ago as being located in one of the most disagreeable sections in the city, from the standpoint of residence.

It is adjacent to the Union Station, with all its smoke, and is surrounded by warehouses and factories and dirt of every kind. In order to allow these lighthouse keepers to have a decent place in which to live, it is proposed to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to sell this property to the highest bidder after due advertisement. It must be sold to the highest bidder after due advertisement, and then they are not allowed by the terms of the bill to spend more than $60,000 for a new house. I do not think they will spend $40,000 to build the residence necessary to house the lighthouse keepers.

The other tract is in Lake County, a rural county of Ohio, where I believe the land is not worth more than $300 an acre at the most. This land has been occupied for sixty some years. I do not see how much can be lost by the transfer of that 1 acre. If it were a private transaction, a quitclaim deed would be given to those in possession of the property as a matter of common decency in order to clear the title to land held as long as this property has been held by the claimant.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired. All time has expired and the Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Commerce is hereby authorized to dispose of the following surplus lighthouse reservations in the manner and under the conditions indicated:

(1) To convey to the State of New York, for public-park purposes, all of the Crown Point Lighthouse Reservation, N. Y., together with all buildings thereon, excepting such tracts of land as are necessary for the maintenance of lights as specified herein; reserving the right to the Lighthouse Service to maintain such lights in the tower or at such other place on the reservation as the needs of navigation may require, and the right to enter upon the reservation by the most convenient route by land or water for the purpose of maintenance of such lights, and reserving an easement for beams of light from such lights, and the right to trim any trees that now exist or may hereafter exist that interfere with or obstruct the range of any such lights. The Lake Champlain Transportation Co., and its successors, shall be permitted to maintain and use its pier, now located at the reservation, erected under permission from the Treasury Department dated May 1, 1888, in the same manner and subject to the same terms and conditions as though the conveyance had not been made. The State of New York shall be required to maintain the memorial tower erected on the Crown Point Lighthouse Reservation under authority of the act of Congress entitled "An act to authorize the erection upon the Crown Point Lighthouse Reservation, N. Y., of a memorial to commemorate the discovery of Lake Champlain," approved February 20, 1911.

(2) To transfer to the War Department for military purposes the portion of the Elm Tree Beacon Lighthouse Reservation, N. Y., described as follows: Beginning at a point on the center of a granite monument on the southwesterly side of New Dorp Lane, which monument marks the northwesterly corner of the property and bears 125 degrees 59 minutes 15 and 0.53 feet from a monument of the topographical department of New York City; thence the property line bears 122 degrees 9 minutes 92 and 0.38 feet to the center of a similar granite monument; thence continuing in the same straight line 154 and 0.66 feet more or less to high-water line of New York Bay; thence along the said high-water line as the same winds and turns to the southwesterly corner of a stone jetty; thence along the southwesterly face of the said jetty 301 degrees and 9 minutes 144 and 0.03 feet to the westerly corner thereof; thence 38 degrees 54 minutes 0.56 feet; thence 304 degrees and 7 minutes 75 feet to the center of a granite monument at the southwesterly corner of the property; thence 36 degrees 35 minutes 229 and 0.033 feet to the center of the stone monument at the point or place of beginning, being an area of 1.1 acres more or less.

(3) To transfer to the Treasury Department for use of the Public Health Service that portion of the Brewerton Channel Range Rear Lighthouse Reservation, Md., located approximately 450 feet outside the line of the quarantine station at Baltimore, Md., except that the Department of Commerce shall retain for lighthouse purposes the site of the skeleton tower on which the rear light of the range is displayed and necessary right of way thereto. The Secretary of Commerce shall describe by metes and bounds the exact portion of the reservation transferred.

(4) To transfer to the Treasury Department for Coast Guard purposes all of the Cape Charles unused Lighthouse Reservation, Va., now lying on the ocean front, consisting of about 6 acres of land on Smiths Island, Va., together with structures thereon.

(5) To transfer to the War Department the parcel of land located at Long Point, N. C., known as the Long Point Lighthouse Reservation, and in exchange therefor the Secretary of War is authorized to permanently transfer to the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Commerce a parcel of land approximately 5.7 acres, located at Coinjock, N. C., and being a portion of lands acquired for improvement of inland waterway from Norfolk, Va., to Beaufort, N. C.

(6) To convey to the city of Fernandina, Fla., for public-park purposes that portion of the Amelia Island Lighthouse Reservation, Fla., consisting of all that portion of section 12, township 3 north, range 29 east, Tallahassee meridian, Fla., lying north of the shell road running east from the city of Fernandina across section 12, reserving to the United States an easement for beams of light from the Amelia Island Lighthouse and the right to trim any trees that now exist or may hereafter exist that interfere with or obstruct the rays of such light.

(7) To convey by quitclaim deed to the heirs of Joel Norton for a consideration of $10 certain land known as the Old Lighthouse Reservation, situated at Cunningham Creek, in Lake County, Ohio, which Joel Norton and descendants have occupied and paid taxes on for many years. The property is described as follows in the deed of March 11, 1836, from Robert Harper, and others to the United States: "A certain piece or parcel of land situated in the township of Madison, county and State aforesaid, which is also in township No. 12, in the sixth range of townships in the Connecticut Western Reserve (so called), in tract No. 1, it being a part of 50 acres of land heretofore deeded by John Cunningham to the Harpersfield Commercial Co. by deed bearing date May 6, A. D. 1816, as follows, to wit: Beginning at a point on the west line of said 50 acres, 34 rods northwardly from the southwest corner of said 50 acres, and running thence north 2° west along said west line 10 rods; thence north 88° east 16 rods; thence south 2° east 10 rods; thence south 88° west 16 rods to the place of beginning, containing 1 acre of land."

(8) To convey to the State of Michigan for public-park purposes, that portion of the Round Island Lighthouse Reservation in the Straits of Mackinac, Mich., lying eastward of a true north and south line passing through a point distant 1,900 feet, 135 degrees true from the center of the Round Island Lighthouse Tower, which tower is located at latitude 45 degrees, 50 minutes, 15 seconds north, and longitude 84 degrees, 37 minutes west, containing approximately 352 acres.

(9) To convey to Keweenaw County, Mich., or to the State of Michigan, a portion of the Copper Harbor Lighthouse Reservation, Mich., for public park purposes, the said tract consisting of 50 acres on the west end of lot 3, section 33, township 59 north, range 28 west, Michigan meridian.

(10) To convey by quitclaim deed to the city and county of Honolulu, Hawaii, for public purposes, a strip of land 20 feet wide, the same being a portion of the Makapuu Point Lighthouse road connecting Koko Head with the Makapuu Point Lighthouse, upon the express conditions (a) that the city and county of Honolulu, Territory of Hawaii, shall maintain that portion of the road transferred in condition suitable for the uninterrupted traffic of motor vehicles of the United States; (b) that within 30 days after receipt of any request therefor from the Secretary of Commerce the clerk of the city and county shall submit to the said Secretary of Commerce a report regarding its compliance with the terms and conditions stated in this paragraph; and (c) that in the event of the failure of such city and county to comply with the conditions of this paragraph the grant shall be forfeited, and upon written notice from the Secretary of Commerce to such clerk the property so conveyed shall immediately revert to the United States without further notice, demand, or action brought. The conditions of clauses (a), (b), and (c) of this paragraph shall be suspended during any period during which a public highway on any other road is open and in good condition, by means of which uninterrupted access may be had by motor vehicles to the Makapuu Point Light Station from Honolulu.

(11) To convey to the Mount Vernon Chapter of the Daughters of the American Revolution the Jones Point Lighthouse Reservation, Va., containing approximately 3,000 square feet, acquired by purchase April 3, 1855, with all structures thereon. The grantee shall maintain the reservation, including the initial boundary stone marking the original southern corner of the District of Columbia, located thereon, in a safe and proper condition for historical purposes.

(12) To convey to the State of Michigan for public-park purposes such portions of the Big Sable and Little Sable Lighthouse Reservations, Mich., as are not required for lighthouse purposes, on such terms and conditions as to providing means of access to the light stations and the Coast Guard station and for maintaining easements for beams of light for the lights that may be maintained by the United States as the Secretary of Commerce shall determine.

(13) To sell and convey by quitclaim deed to the highest bidder, after due advertisement and upon such terms as the Secretary of Commerce may deem for the best interests of the United States, the lighthouse property located on West Ninth Street and Main Avenue, in the city of Cleveland, Ohio, together with the keepers' dwellings and other improvements thereon. The Secretary of Commerce is authorized to provide suitable quarters for the lighthouse keepers, in the city of Cleveland, Ohio, and to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a suitable site, and to contract for the erection and completion of suitable buildings thereon, and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $60,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be available for such purpose, including the purchase of necessary equipment and the rental of temporary quarters for the lighthouse keepers.

Mr. WATSON. May I inquire if each conveyance is to rest upon the specifications mentioned therein?

Mr. PARKER. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. Therefore after this bill is passed and a conveyance is made, the United States can not make any other easements than are mentioned in this statement.

Mr. MERRITT. No; all the conditions go with the original grant.

Mr. WATSON. Therefore if, after the passage of this bill, the Government thinks it wise to make another reservation when it conveys the property to New York, it can not do so until it comes into the House again.

Mr. MERRITT. Of course, under the general provision it can take back the whole property for Government purposes.

Mr. WATSON. I know; but that is not my thought. When the Government conveys this property to the State of New York there are here mentioned certain easements. After the passage of this bill, if the Government desires to create another easement, can the Government do so without coming to the House for permission?

Mr. MERRITT. I should say not, without reentering on the land and taking possession of it under the general provision.

Mr. WATSON. Taking entire possession of it?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. If they can take the whole, why can not they take back a part?

Mr. WATSON. That is not the question; the question is in regard to making the original conveyance. If the conveyance is made to the State of New York and the State desires to erect a hotel for park purposes, can it do so without getting permission from the Government?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. New York can do what it pleases with it, if it is for park purposes.

Mr. MERRITT. I do not think that New York would be so foolish as to build a hotel on it, because they might lose the hotel.

Mr. WATSON. The State might like to erect a building on the property so conveyed to it.

Mr. MERRITT. They could do anything consistent with park purposes.

Mr. WATSON. It might want to put up a factory.

Mr. MERRITT. Not for park purposes.

Mr. WATSON. It might want to build a factory for the manufacture of ice cream.

Mr. MERRITT. If they did that, the Government probably would regain the property.

Mr. WATSON. This conveyance is not to be in fee simple?

Mr. MERRITT. No; it is a revocable license.

Mr. WATSON. It is to be recorded?

Mr. MERRITT. All of these matters are of record, I presume. The point is that nothing can be done under this bill to take the title out of the United States.

Mr. WATSON. I understand that.

Mr. MERRITT. No one by fraud can divest the United States of any right whatever in regard to this property.

Mr. WATSON. I notice that there is a pier reserved for the Champlain Transportation Co. If any other company wanted to have a pier, would it have the right without getting the permission of the Government?

Mr. MERRITT. They would have to go to the State.

Mr. WATSON. And it would not have to apply to the Government?

Mr. MERRITT. No; I think not.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

(b) The Public Health Service is authorized, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, to provide medical, surgical, and hospital services and supplies for the officers and crews of vessels of the Lighthouse Service, including when practicable the detail of medical officers on such vessels.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question. What is involved in these two paragraphs?

Mr. PARKER. These two paragraphs are to put the Lighthouse Service on the same basis as the Coast Guard. The Coast Guard is given medical attendance, and we desire to put the Lighthouse Service on the same basis.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Then this has nothing to do with the disposition of public property?

Mr. PARKER. Absolutely not.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. It really belongs in another bill.

Mr. MERRITT. I will say that under this section now being read very full hearings were had in the last Congress. The bill passed the House and was lost in the Senate. The idea of these two sections is to give these men who are in distant lighthouses where there are no hospitals, where they can not go to a regular health hospital, to give them the same right as the Coast Guard has to go to a private hospital.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. My question grew out of the fact that it was entirely foreign to the rest of the bill.

Mr. MERRITT. Yes; we thought it would save the time of the House if these matters relating to the Lighthouse Service were all comprised in one bill.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. The Commissioner of Lighthouses, subject to the approval of the Secretary of Commerce, is authorized to determine any claim not exceeding $500 of any officer or employee of the field service of the Lighthouse Service for personal property hereafter lost or damaged at stations, depots, or on vessels of the Lighthouse Service, or in transit by reason of official duties, as a result of storm, fire, shipwreck, or other extraordinary cause not due to the negligence or voluntary act of such officer or employee, if the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, finds and declares that such property was useful and reasonably necessary to such officer or employee in his line of duty. The Secretary shall report the amounts so determined to Congress for payment as legal claims out of appropriations that may be made by Congress therefor.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MADDEN: Strike out all of section 4.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, there have been a great many cases of the kind referred to in section 4 submitted by the Chief of the Lighthouse Service in the Department of Commerce for adjudication by the Appropriations Committee. It has frequently happened that we found from the evidence in the case that recommendations have been made for payment of compensation for the loss of equipment, clothing, goods, and other valuables, shipped by the employees of the service on the boats of the Government for which there is no charge made, where the packing of the goods has been badly planned and executed under the supervision of the man who makes the claim for damages and loss. It seems to me, in the light of all the cases that have come from the Department of Commerce that the Committee on Appropriations has been obliged to reject, based on the facts and on the law in the case, that this section of the bill is an attempt on the part of the Department of Commerce to legalize things that have proved to be illegal, where attempts have been made by the committee to adjust claims by men in the service.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Is not the Post Office Department authorized to make adjudications in small claims?

Mr. MADDEN. They are all allowed—these people are allowed, the Department of Commerce is allowed—under the law to do certain things, but they have come to us with such cases that we were not able to agree on with them, and now they are putting the case in another form so as to compel us to do it.

Mr. PARKER. Will the gentleman take section 4 and change the $500 amount to some other amount?

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, I am against the whole thing.

Mr. PARKER. So that they can settle small claims.

Mr. MADDEN. They ought not to be allowed to settle, and they are not allowed to settle these matters in any department.

Mr. PARKER. Except the post office?

Mr. MADDEN. They are, but they come to the committee with recommendations after they have made an adjustment, and then the committee compels them to prove the legal liability of the Government of the United States in every case, but in many cases they have not been able to do it.

Mr. MERRITT. How about the Army and the Navy?

Mr. MADDEN. We do it with all of them.

Mr. MERRITT. Why not with these people?

Mr. MADDEN. These people have not been able to prove the claims they brought before us. It seems to me that their records are bad and they try to adjudicate cases not warranted, and if they do that under existing circumstances they will do it under any circumstances. We ought not under any circumstances to permit the comptroller's decisions to be overridden by legislation where there is no justification for any other decision except the one rendered.

When we passed the Budget act we provided that the Comptroller General should take the place of the Comptroller of the Treasury, who was the head of the auditing sections of the Government, of which there were six. The Comptroller of the Treasury, in other words, the chief auditor, was an independent officer appointed by the President, to whom appeals might be taken from decisions rendered by the various auditors, and invariably when the auditor general or the Comptroller of the Treasury, as he was then called, refused to render decisions in keeping with the demands of the departments, if they had influence enough with the President they had the comptroller removed until they got a decision such as they wanted. The Treasury was not even secondary in the consideration of the problem. The taxpayer had no chance anywhere. We are now trying to protect the taxpayer. This section of this bill takes away the right of the taxpayer to protection, and it ought not to be passed. When we passed the Budget act we created what is known as the Comptroller General and we authorized the President to appoint him, but we took away the power of the President to discharge him, and now nobody can get a decision that is not in accordance with the law, no matter how much influence he may have. When they run up against the Comptroller General with an illegal claim and it is rejected, when it is rejected you will find all the newspapers in the country being fed with propaganda against the comptroller because he stands for the law. Then, when they can not do anything else they come before the House and Senate committees and ask to have the law changed, so as to set aside the ruling of the Comptroller General. What we ought to do is to protect the Treasury of the United States, and the way to do it is to knock this section of the bill out.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in my judgment this section is one of the fairest provisions in this bill. What does it do? It simply gives to these people who are engaged in this isolated Lighthouse Service the same privilege under the law which is now given to those who are in the regular military and naval service. In so far as the amount of claims that may be settled is concerned, I believe the amount is similar to that in the Post Office law, where the department has the authority to settle claims not exceeding a certain figure. The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has by inference in his argument suggested that if this bill is passed the Appropriations Committee will not hold the purse strings. Of course, that is not the case at all. That committee will have the same right to control the appropriations that may be made under the provisions of this particular act as it has to-day, and as the gentleman just three minutes ago told us they do in respect to their method of controlling claims that come before the Post Office Department or that come from the soldiers and the sailors. That committee can make these people prove the facts so as to show that they have not settled a claim except one that is just and fair. In other words, they check up to see whether the policy of settlement laid down in the law is carried out.

What is the situation to-day? When these losses are incurred by some of the poor people working in the Lighthouse Service, the individual that loses a few hundred dollars' worth of clothing or some other necessities of life, and who is acquainted with a Member of Congress with influence or something of that sort gets the Member of Congress to introduce a special claims bill for him and he gets that bill through once in a while. The ones who have the influence, the ones who can perhaps most afford to lose are the ones who get relief, and the rest of them do not get relief at all.

The property contemplated as falling within the provisions of this act is safeguarded. It does not include jewelry or works of art or anything of that sort, as suggested by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON]. It simply includes property that the Secretary finds and declares "was useful and reasonably necessary to such officer or employee in his line of duty," property that was reasonably necessary in his work of guarding one of these lighthouse stations. When these claims are settled, the Department of Commerce would bring in its report for the purpose of obtaining from the gentleman from Illinois and other members of the Committee on Appropriations the money needed to settle these claims; they would have to show the committee that the claims come directly within those provisions of the act, and I take it that there is no danger but that the gentleman from Illinois and all the rest of the members of the Committee on Appropriations will stand on guard watching as they have done so well heretofore, the interests of the people of the taxpayers' country. But in fairness to all of these people so that they may all be treated alike, so that there will not be discrimination in favor of a man with influence and against those without it, I think the section ought to stay in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. DOWELL. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURTNESS] how he can read into this section the right of the Committee on Appropriations to determine these claims after they have been determined by the officer?

Mr. BURTNESS. The officer will determine the claim, but he will have no money with which to pay the claim until the money comes from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. DOWELL. After the matter has been determined legally the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has but one thing to do, and that is to recommend the payment of the claim, whatever it may be. There is no question about it.

Mr. BURTNESS. The gentleman from Illinois told you on the floor only a few moments ago that when various departments come and demand the payment of claims the committee forces them to show that they have approved the claim in a legal way.

Mr. DOWELL. But in this statute you are determining the amount by law. The Committee on Appropriations has absolutely nothing to do with the amount of it, I care not what it may be. If it is only worth 10 cents and the amount determined is $500, the Committee on Appropriations must recommend the payment of the $500, because it is determined by law in this section. It does seem to me, whatever may be the right here, that the gentleman from North Dakota can not say to this House that we are leaving this question to the Committee on Appropriations to determine, when as a matter of law it is determined by the officers, and all the Committee on Appropriations has to do is to pay the claim.

Mr. BURTNESS. Does not the gentleman concede that in substance and in general these provisions are identical with the provisions of the act for the relief of the members of the Army and the Navy in matters of this kind?

Mr. DOWELL. It says "determine any claim." The gentleman from North Dakota tried to specify that it applied only to certain kinds of personal property, but this says "any claim not exceeding $500." The question was raised by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. When this statute is adopted you take from the Committee on Appropriations every power to make inquiry back of the finding of the officer. They have no authority under this law to go behind that finding. All they have to do is to take the finding of the officer and pay the claim.

Mr. BURTNESS. Does the gentleman claim that the right is taken away from the Committee on Appropriations to determine whether the findings have been made by the department in accordance with the law and the facts?

Mr. DOWELL. Certainly. It says, "The finding must be made by the officer," and when he has followed that law the Committee on Appropriations has nothing to do with it but to pay it. It seems to me that whatever may be the intention here of the committee, the plain language of this statute, if it is adopted, takes from this Congress, takes from the Committee on Appropriations, every power to inquire into any claim that may be allowed.

Mr. BURTNESS. The gentleman has apparently entirely overlooked the language, which makes it even plainer than the rest of the statute. It says:

The Secretary shall report the amount so determined to Congress for payment as a legal claim out of appropriations that may be made by Congress therefor.

Mr. DOWELL. Certainly; legal claims. It is as plain as it can be that the Committee on Appropriations has nothing further to do with it.

Mr. HUDSON. Does not the language say that this commissioner is to determine the claim?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes; and it is a legal claim.

Mr. HUDSON. The hands of the Committee on Appropriations are tied. The gentleman from North Dakota wants to take the view that Congress may sit down and say, "We will not pay a legal claim."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOWELL. I do not know the intention of the committee, but I object to the construction that the committee is placing upon this statute. I maintain that everyone who carefully reads this statute will agree with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. Neither this House nor anybody in this House has anything to say about the legality of that claim when it has been determined by the commissioner.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I will accept the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the floor.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORTON D. HULL] rises in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. What is the language of the act which authorizes the Post Office Department to settle these minor claims?

Mr. MADDEN. The Post Office Department is required to show the Committee on Appropriations the legal liability of any claim which they may submit to the committee for appropriation. Under this they have already determined the legal liability, and all the committee would have to do would be to insert the amount stated to be due.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. What is the language that requires that?

Mr. MADDEN. I can not quote the exact language. They recommend, but they do not determine the legal liability until we accept it.

Mr. HUDSON. We have a particular case now in which the department recommends what the amount shall be. But they did not determine.

Mr. MADDEN. They recommend; that is all.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] to strike out the section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I move that that be made section 4.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will correct the numbering of the section.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. Hereafter officers and crews of vessels of the Lighthouse Service and light keepers and depot keepers of the Lighthouse Service shall be permitted to purchase commissary and quartermaster supplies from the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps at the price charged officers and enlisted men of the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, in line 2, page 11, I move to strike out the word "Lighthouse," and I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to speak out of order for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen of the committee, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the plea of the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee to protect the Treasury of the United States and to protect the taxpayers of the United States. Therefore, in these few minutes I wish to bring to the attention of the House information which throws some light on a proposition which, in my humble judgment, would not protect the Treasury or the taxpayers of the United States. I think it is very appropriate to bring this matter to the attention of the House during the consideration of the lighthouse bill, which we are now discussing. The press report which I will read in part will throw some light on the capacity of the Italian Government to pay its war debts.

The Washington Post of Monday, April 12, contains a quoted speech delivered by Premier Mussolini of Italy at Tripoli on April 11, and which reads in part as follows:

Facist Italian Tripoli! You represent here Italy, which is daily more prosperous and powerful. Rome carries the beacon lamp of strength to the shores of the African Sea. No one can stop our inexorable will.

This utterance by the Premier of the Italian Government does not square with the financial condition as presented by the representatives of the Italian Government when they were negotiating the Italian debt settlement. This debt settlement places a burden of $1,513,808,000 upon the taxpayers and Treasury of the United States and relieves the taxpayers and the Government of Italy of this burden.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHAFER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Did the gentleman ever hear a boy whistling when he was in the dark?

Mr. SCHAFER. I do not get the gentleman's point.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, Mussolini was simply whistling in the dark. He was trying to keep up his courage.

Mr. SCHAFER. Well, if we can not take Mussolini's statement as to the prosperity and capacity of the Italian Government when delivering his speech to Tripoli and give it any great weight, then I do not think we should give any great weight to the statements of the representatives of the Italian Government who negotiated the refunding of the debt of the Italian Government.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. SCHAFER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman no doubt noticed in the press the other day that Trotsky made the announcement that the infamous communistic Soviet Government of Russia was the most successful Government in all the world. He was whistling in the dark, too.

Mr. SCHAFER. Well, I will say that Trotsky did not make that statement one day, and then when he came to another government to have his debts refunded at the expense of the nation to which his Government owed money claim that his Government was too poor to pay.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will yield further, the difference between Mussolini and Trotsky is that Mussolini says, "I will pay you so much," while Trotsky says, "I will not pay you anything." That is the difference between the two Governments. [Applause.]

Mr. SCHAFER. Well, I can see where the gentleman from Texas, who repeatedly stands on the floor of this House and talks about protecting the rights and interests of the poor taxpayers of the Nation, has been a little derelict in his duty and would rather protect the interests of the taxpayers of our debtor nations at the expense of the taxpayers of our own Nation. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment to strike out the word "lighthouse" will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 8. Hereafter the provisions of section 6 of the act entitled "An act to authorize aids to navigation and for other works in the Lighthouse Service, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1918, as amended, shall apply to the Commissioner of Lighthouses, the Deputy Commissioner of Lighthouses, the chief constructing engineer, and the superintendent of naval construction of the Lighthouse Service.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 8. This section makes the act of 1918 applicable to the men referred to in this section. Section 6 of the act of 1918 provides that the men in certain services of the Government, the military service, the Coast Guard Service, and other services of that character, shall be permitted to retire at the age of 65 years, and after 30 years of service, and they are compulsorily retired at the age of 70. These men are in the civil service of the Government. You are going to do something for them that you compel other people to pay for, and you are going to give them what you do give them free. They are not called upon under this section of the bill to pay one single dollar toward the retirement compensation which they are authorized to receive under this act. I do not see why we should do that, and I do not think we should. I do not think we should make a preferential class.

Mr. MERRITT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MERRITT. What happens in this service differs from what happens in the Coast Guard Service in this respect: The men you speak of as being put in a preferential class are already—when they are in the field service—under the retirement law. Now, it is for the benefit of this service to put those who are familiar with the field service into these four office positions, because they know more about the work, and unless we amend the bill in this way a man who has been in the field for a number of years, and is subjected to all the dangers, and is promoted for his good work, as he should be, will lose the benefit which he had before, and I do not think that is just.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think this is just. I think this ought not to pass. I do not think we ought to pick out a special class for special consideration.

We are talking a great deal about the amount of money that will be required to pay the cost of the so-called retirement of civil service employees in the Government. These men and women are now required to pay 2½ per cent of the salaries they draw toward the retirement fund, and there is a bill pending to make them pay 4 per cent, and still there is a great deal of doubt in the minds of many about the wisdom of enacting that law. But right in the teeth of that situation we come here with a bill that retires people without the payment of one dollar toward the cost.

I wonder if we are ever going to reach the point where nobody pays any attention whatever to the people who pay these bills? All anyone has to do now is to be on a Government pay roll and then he reaches the situation where he says that under the starvation wage he is receiving he must be protected in his old age, but who pays for the protection of the man who gets behind the plow at 3 o'clock in the morning and plows through the fields all day in the broiling sun? Whose pension roll does he go on? Do you say he does not pay any part of the bill? He does. He may not file a tax schedule. He may not have a heavy income-tax payment to make, but in the long run he pays the income-tax payment of the man who files a schedule because he pays for it in everything he buys.

You can not justify the payment of pensions to the men who are occupying these high places here, and they are occupying high places and drawing big salaries. They ought to be able to save enough money out of what they get to take care of themselves when they get through with Government service. If they do not do it, we are not to blame. Who is going to take care of the man who digs coal in the coal mines? Whose pension roll does he go on? Who is going to take care of the man who digs sewers and erects the buildings and carries the bricks and works in the brickyards or in the machine shops? Is there any consideration to be given to him or is it only necessary to get on the Government pay roll to be put in a preferred class?

I hope this section will be stricken from the bill.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment, for the purpose of asking a question. I would like to ask if this is the situation raised by this section. If a man has been 30 years in the Lighthouse Service and finally acquires the right to a pension, if he is then promoted to be chief of the service, he loses his right to a pension under the present system.

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. And this will preserve his rights along that line upon promotion?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. And he ought not to get it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] to strike out section 8.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HUDDLESTON) there were—ayes 29, noes 41.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. TILSON) having resumed the chair, Mr. CHINDBLOM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10860) to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to dispose of certain lighthouse reservations and to increase the efficiency of the Lighthouse Service, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed, read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit. I move to recommit this bill to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, with instructions to report the same back forthwith with the following amendment, to wit, with section 8 stricken out.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLANTON moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, with instructions to that committee to report the same back forthwith with an amendment striking out all of section 8.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Texas to recommit the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Would it be out of order for the Chair to state that the motion to recommit is the same as the amendment offered by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has stated it in his parliamentary inquiry to the Chair.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 30, noes 47.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote because there is not a quorum present, and make the point of order there is not a quorum present.

Mr. PARKER. Will the gentleman withhold that so I may make a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman can make it afterwards. We have already had to stay here all the afternoon, and we might just as well stay here longer.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his point of order so that I may present a privileged report?

Mr. BLANTON. In case the Chair will protect me on the point of no quorum, I will withhold it and let the gentleman do so; but otherwise, not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can protect himself on that.

Mr. BLANTON. In protecting myself I will have to insist on my point.

Mr. SNELL. I would like to present a rule.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that while the gentleman has made a point of order that there is no quorum present upon the rising vote, the Chair has not announced there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has not yet had an opportunity to count. The Chair will count the Members present as soon as he has the opportunity to do so.

Mr. BLANTON. And if there is not a quorum present, that will force an automatic roll call. Then I withhold my point for a moment.

BANKRUPTCY

Mr. SNELL, chairman of the Committee on Rules, presented a report from that committee providing for the consideration of a bill (S. 1039) to amend an act establishing a uniform system of bankruptcy, which was referred to the House Calendar.

RURAL POST ROADS

Mr. SNELL also presented a report from the Committee on Rules for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9504) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide that the United States shall aid the States in the construction of rural post roads, and for other purposes," which was referred to the House Calendar.

FOREIGN COMMERCE SERVICE

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to go back to the bill H. R. 3858 and make a clerical correction.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the proceedings on the vote to recommit will be vacated.

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKER. In the bill H. R. 3858, page 5, I wish to strike out, in line 7, the words "incurred for subsistence," which is a repetition, because it is covered in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. Hoch].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be made.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the Chair understood the request of the gentleman from New York. It was not with reference to the bill under consideration, but is with reference to the bill previously passed by the House.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted to suggest, would it not be a proper procedure to ask unanimous consent that in the engrossment of the bill those words may be omitted?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That would be all that would be necessary.

Mr. PARKER. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that in the engrossment of the bill H. R. 3858, on page 5, line 7, the words "incurred for subsistence" may be omitted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

LIGHTHOUSE SERVICE

Mr. PARKER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PARKER. When will the vote come on the previous question if the House should now adjourn?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The vote will come on the motion of the gentleman from Texas to recommit on next Thursday.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Has the previous question been ordered?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The previous question has been ordered on the motion to recommit and also on the bill and all amendments thereto. The House began to divide, but that vote has been vacated. So that the question will be on the motion to recommit.

Mr. PARKER. And that will come up on Wednesday or Thursday?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On Thursday morning.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock p. m.), the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, April 14, 1926, at 12 o'clock noon.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture, in response to Senate Resolution 184 (by Mr. WALSH, agreed to March 31, 1926), relative to the recent shipment of live elk from the National Bison Range in Montana to the State of Massachusetts, which, with the accompanying paper, was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

NATIONAL PARKS IN SOUTHERN APPALACHIAN MOUNTAINS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior submitting, pursuant to law, recommendations relative to the establishment of national parks in the southern Appalachian Mountains, together with a report of the Southern Appalachian National Park Commission, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

STATE TAX OF KANSAS

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Record at this point a letter in regard to the State tax of the State of Kansas. A statement was inserted in the Record some time since on this subject, which did the State an injustice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The letter is as follows:

APRIL 1, 1926.

Hon. BEN S. PAULEN,

Governor, State of Kansas.

DEAR GOVERNOR PAULEN: Yesterday you called my attention to an address by Congressman W. R. WOOD, of Indiana, which appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD December 18, 1925.

In this address Congressman Wood makes use of the financial statistics of States, as compiled by the United States Census Bureau, and compares the expenditures of 1924 with those of 1917.

The classification of expenditures as made by the bureau shows Kansas with a per capita cost of $3.65 in 1917 and $22.17 in 1924, only one State in the Union having a higher per capita expenditure in 1924.

In order that you may have the facts, I wish to advise that the Federal figures include the soldiers' compensation in amount of $28,978,466.15, paid by Kansas in 1924 to her World War veterans. This fund came from the sale of bonds of the State, which are being paid off at the rate of $1,000,000 a year.

The total expenditure for State government in Kansas in 1924 was $12,339,639.08, exclusive of the soldiers' bonus, which was a per capita expenditure of $6.80, based on the 1925 census.

The total expenditure in 1917 was $6,440,510.47; a per capita cost of $3.65. It would be manifestly unfair and misleading to say that the cost of State government in Kansas in 1924 was $41,318,105.23, as $28,978,466.15 of that amount was a payment to the soldier boys, and could not be properly included.

May I give you the correct expenditures for the years 1917 and 1924, classified as follows:

Executive department.....	$136,676.33	$222,583.25
Judicial department.....	213,383.11	337,996.02
State agencies and legislative expense.....	1,602,692.18	2,947,055.82
Educational institutions.....	2,529,776.59	5,595,134.81
Charitable institutions.....	1,013,674.00	1,553,526.59
Penal institutions.....	784,436.02	1,432,691.80
Patriotic institutions.....	162,872.24	250,650.79
Total.....	6,440,510.47	12,339,639.08
Soldiers' compensation.....		28,978,466.15

Of the $12,339,639.08 expended in 1924, $6,506,031.91 came from direct or property taxes and the remainder from fees and indirect sources, such as corporation and inheritance taxes, etc.

Congressman Wood is not to be criticized, as he used the Federal figures, except that in commenting he referred to the expenditures as being "routine" and aside from any special expenditures. The Kansas soldiers' bonus was "special" and not a "routine" item.

Leaving out the soldiers' bonus item, some 35 other States in the Union had a higher per capita expenditure than Kansas in 1924.

You may feel at liberty to utilize the facts given in this letter in any way that you see fit.

Yours very truly,

N. A. TURNER,
State Budget Director.

DEVELOPMENTS IN MISSISSIPPI

Mr. STEPHENS. A few days ago there appeared an article in the Baltimore Sun written by a man by the name of L. R. Cleveland. This article reflected very much upon the people of my State and the State itself in regard to conditions there. It was a scurrilous and slanderous publication and was such a misstatement of facts that an answer has been written by Mr. L. J. Folse, of the Mississippi State Board of Development. It has been given to the public. I have here a rather brief article, which contains Mr. Folse's reply, which was published on April 12, 1926, in the Commercial Appeal, of Memphis, Tenn., which I ask may be inserted in the Record at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

MISSISSIPPI FIGHTS BACK AT HER CRITICS—LAYS CARDS ON TABLE IN ANSWERING BALTIMORE SUN—CITES SCHOOL RECORD—ADVANCE OF EDUCATION FIVEFOLD IN 10 YEARS—THE DISAPPEARANCE OF "ONE-HORSE" SCHOOL, ETC., IS HER ARGUMENT

The phenomenal advance of the State of Mississippi in education, its position among other States of the Nation regarding those requisites for happiness and contentment, told in figures to make sure of their facts, have been hurled in the face of an article appearing in a recent issue of the Baltimore Sun, written by L. R. Cleveland, a man said to be unknown to the "Magnolia State."

These figures were compiled by L. J. Folse, general manager of the Mississippi State Board of Development, and prepared in such a way as to register a striking argument against certain propaganda that Mississippi has unjustly suffered.

THE EVIDENCE

In his reply Mr. Folse sets forth a condensed summary of what is doing in this State and its future possibilities, as follows:

On December 20, 1817, Mississippi became the twentieth State of the Union. Nature endowed Mississippi with many advantages. Up to 20 years ago the State was backward in economic development. Since that time, as a result of scientific agricultural development and general industrial expansion, Mississippi has made great progress.

Between 1880 and 1920 the population of Mississippi increased 60 per cent, but in the same period its per capita wealth increased 298 per cent; the assessed valuation of all property in the State increased 551 per cent; bank deposits increased 6,379 per cent; and the value of manufactured products increased 2,275 per cent; and the amount invested annually for public schools increased 1,030 per cent.

No State in the Union has given greater attention in recent years to education than Mississippi. In 1900 Mississippi invested in public education $1,385,000; in 1910 $2,726,000; in 1922 $9,390,000.

The per capita expenditure for school for every child 5 to 7 years of age, increased from $2.34 in 1900 to $15.84 in 1922.

To-day Mississippi has 1,000 strong central consolidated or rural high schools, which have taken the place of more than 3,000 small one and two teacher schools. Three hundred and thirty of these schools have a 10-acre plot of land which belongs to the school, on which a home has been built for the teachers and furnished them, rent free. Thus the teacher and his family become a part of the community for 12 months in the year.

Fifty-one of our counties have built magnificent agricultural high schools, with boarding accommodations, varying from 50 to 250 students. The cost for board and incidental expenses is about $10 per month.

In 1910 we had only two consolidated schools, with an enrollment of 205 students and property worth $8,000; in 1925 we have nearly 1,000 consolidated high schools, with property valued at $10,747,000 and 144,498 children enrolled. The growth in this field of education in Mississippi is not surpassed anywhere.

Approximately $300,000 is being spent annually on the building of good rural schools, with industrial departments, for the negro girls and boys of the State. The plan of education worked out for the colored population of Coahoma County is said by experts to be the best of its kind in the world.

Not content with this high achievement in educational work a complete survey of the entire educational system of the State was completed by a commission of competent educators from various sections of the country.

EDUCATIONAL RECORD

According to the recent survey there are more high school graduates in Mississippi entering college every year than in any other State in proportion to our population. We have six colleges on the "A" list, with several others nearly up to standard, not to mention the junior colleges located at convenient places in the State.

We spend annually for the maintenance of our public schools approximately $14,000,000.

Illiteracy for native white was only 3.6 per cent; for negro population, 29.3 per cent; for whole population, 16 to 20, 12 per cent.

The mortgage debt on Mississippi farms in 1920 was $30,046,000, or 30.3 per cent of the value covered, against 31.7 per cent in 1910. The average interest paid in 1920 was 6.5 per cent. The average value of a farm in 1920 was $4,539, while the average debt per farm was $1,375.

The birth rate of Mississippi was 24 per thousand for 1923, or, respectively, 24.5 per cent for the white population and 23.5 per cent for the colored.

For the United States the birth rate in 1923 was 33.8 per cent. The average number of children born to a mother in the United States in 1923 was 3.3 per cent; for the mothers of Mississippi it was 3.7 per cent.

The illegitimate birth rate for the entire registration area was 1.4 per cent for the white population; it was only 0.9 per cent for the white population of Mississippi.

The proportion of white to the total population in 1910 was 46 per cent; it was 48 per cent in 1920.

In health achievement Mississippi has an enviable record. Its death rate for whites is lower than that of any Southern State, and, as will be noted from the foregoing statements, its record is not surpassed in other important departments.

Mississippi is particularly proud in its achievement of malaria eradication and control. It has reduced malaria infection by 55 per cent, and, according to the Federal department of health, it is the only Southern State qualified to speak authoritatively with respect to the condition of malaria. In five years it has reduced malaria infection by 55 per cent for the State as a whole, and it has eliminated it entirely in certain counties and its present program contemplates the total eradication of this disease in the State.

Mississippi is rapidly establishing in each county an "All times health unit." It has, or will have by January, 1927, 20 counties with this service. No greater contribution can be made to the welfare of the people of the rural districts than by extending this phase of our health work.

The land area of Mississippi is 46,362 square miles, the population per square mile in 1920 was 38.6, the total population for the State for that year being 1,790,618. The rural population for 1920 was 1,589,497, or 86.6 per cent of the total population.

GREAT FARMING STATE

From 1910 to 1920 the value of farm property, etc., increased as follows:

	Per cent
Value of all farm property.....	126.3
Value of all farm buildings.....	84.7
Value of all farm improvements.....	135.9
Value of all livestock.....	79.4
Value of all farm crops.....	139.2

Mississippi is third in strawberry production per acre.

Mississippi sold 9,344 pounds of butterfat in 1909 and 1,864,594 pounds in 1919, the greatest increase of any State.

Mississippi leads the entire Mississippi Valley with a 34 per cent increase in corn production for the same period.

From 1910 to 1920 Mississippi led all of the States with a 96 per cent increase in hay production for the same period.

The first carload of butter shipped from the South was shipped from Mississippi. Mississippi has made greater progress in dairying than any State in the Union. On March 10 the Borden Condensed Milk Co. opened its $750,000 condensery at Starkville, Miss. This is the only plant of its kind in the South and is, in fact, a great recognition of the present and future possibilities of this industry in Mississippi.

Mississippi's creamery output in 1923 (Government report) was greater than the combined output of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Florida, and Louisiana. This was made possible by the unsurpassed pasture values, of which the Government station at McNeill, Miss., says in a bulletin: "It can no longer be doubted that pastures in Mississippi can be established which will equal or excel in carrying capacity any pastures in the United States, and this at a very low cost of establishment." After reciting specific performances, it goes on to say, "Pastures of such high-carrying capacity over such long periods are not known elsewhere in the United States."

The Mississippi Power Co., operating in northeast and in south Mississippi, the Mississippi Power & Light Co., operating in central and northwest Mississippi, are now serving practically every town and city in the State, and the investment of these two companies will reach $50,000,000 in a short time.

The State highway system in Mississippi comprises over 4,800 miles, over 2,500 miles of which are practically completed; while most of our roads are of gravel construction, we have many hundred miles of paved and brick highways. Paved highway is being built along the entire coast line of Mississippi, extending from the Alabama to the Louisiana line, one-half of which is completed. We have spent in 1926 for bridges alone over $6,000,000, and we look for Federal approval for the construction of a bridge over the Mississippi River at Natchez and Vicksburg.

The finest private residence, I believe, to be found in the entire South is being built by Mr. Hugh L. White at Columbia, Miss., and it will cost over $300,000.

In the 90 or more cities and towns in Mississippi of over 1,000 population I do not believe there is to be found in any State a higher expression of culture than is demonstrated in the private homes, churches, and public buildings.

Thousands of investors, unlike misinformed people like Mr. Cleveland, have discovered that Mississippi offers unsurpassed opportunities, and the development of our Gulf coast alone within the past two years has increased the taxable wealth of that section over $60,000,000, and the coast line of Mississippi is without doubt unsurpassed in natural beauty.

Due to the fine work of the Mississippi Legislature of 1924 and 1926, we feel the public policy of the State of Mississippi is as favorable to the investor as that of any other State, and we shall gladly give information as to specific laws or answer inquiries regarding the public policy of the State.

DIVISION OF SAFETY IN THE DEPARTMENT OF LABOR

Mr. SHORTRIDGE introduced a bill (S. 3983) to create in the Bureau of Labor Statistics, of the Department of Labor, a division of safety, which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, permit me to state briefly the purpose of this bill. There is no such thing as an adequate system of industrial accident reporting in the United States. The best obtainable estimate is that the death toll of industrial accidents is not under 23,000 per year and that non-fatal injuries total 2,500,000. The days of labor lost as a result of these injuries has been said to be 227,169,970 per annum and the wage loss $1,022,264,866. Under the workmen's compensation laws of various States there is paid annually in compensation something like $250,000,000, or about one-fifth of the actual wage loss.

It is hoped by this bill to put an agency of the Government in a position to collect and organize the actual facts in such a way as to greatly reduce these casualties. The full cooperation of the States and all other accident-reporting organizations will be sought and, it is believed, secured, to the end that attention may be called, not in general terms but by specific reference, to the places and causes of these accidents.

Some 20 years ago the iron and steel industry voluntarily agreed to report all accidents and all pertinent facts regarding accidents to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, which in turn compiled these records in such a form as to locate by departments, and in some instances even by occupations, the dangerous spots in the industry. The management of the industry in turn, guided by these figures, have so intelligently directed their safety work within the industry as to have reduced their frequency rate from 80.8 in 1907, when this work was begun, to 30.8 in 1924, per thousand full-time workers in those plants. If anything approximating these results can be secured in other industries, it would seem that it is high time we were providing for the extension of the methods.

In a word, Mr. President, the purpose of this bill is to reduce the haphazard to life and limb of men, women, and children engaged in industry. From a humanitarian and an economic-commercial point of view the bureau to be set up will do much good to employer and employee.

I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

On motion of Mr. SWANSON, the Committee on Foreign Relations was discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 77) authorizing certain military organizations to visit France, England, and Belgium, and it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENT TO RIVERS AND HARBORS BILL

Mr. HALE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 11176) authorizing the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

ALIENS WHO SERVED IN ARMY OR NAVY

Mr. WADSWORTH submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 9761) to supplement the naturalization laws by extending certain privileges to aliens who served honorably in the military or naval forces of the United States during the World War, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

HOUSE BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED

The following bill and joint resolution were each read twice by title and referred as indicated below:

H. R. 3858. An act to establish in the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce of the Department of Commerce a foreign commerce service of the United States, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Commerce.

REGULATION OF AIRCRAFT IN COMMERCE

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 41) to encourage and regulate the use of aircraft in commerce, and for other purposes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House, ask for a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Vice President appointed Mr. JONES of Washington, Mr. FERNALD, Mr. BINGHAM, Mr. FLETCHER, and Mr. RANDELL conferees on the part of the Senate.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE ON OUTDOOR RECREATION

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I hold in my hand the manuscript of the proceedings of the National Conference on Outdoor Recreation, compiled by Hanford MacNider, Assistant Secretary of War, and I ask unanimous consent that his letter may be printed in the RECORD and the manuscript referred to the Committee on Printing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The letter of the Assistant Secretary of War is as follows:

NATIONAL CONFERENCE ON OUTDOOR RECREATION,
Washington, D. C., April 1, 1926.

The Hon. GEORGE H. MOSES,

Chairman Committee on Printing, United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR MOSES: Through your courtesy the proceedings of the meetings of the National Conference on Outdoor Recreation, held under the auspices of the President in Washington, have been printed as Senate Documents No. 151 and No. 229.

Last January, at the invitation of the President's committee, a meeting of the National Conference on Outdoor Recreation was held, and it would be most helpful if the proceedings of this meeting could likewise be published as a public document, for in fact these proceedings are in the nature of a report to the President's Committee on Outdoor Recreation.

Very sincerely yours,

HANFORD MACNIDER,
The Assistant Secretary of War,
Executive Secretary President's Committee on Outdoor Recreation.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE PRESIDENT'S AIRCRAFT BOARD

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 9), which was read as follows:

Mr. FESS. For the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PEPPER] I ask that the concurrent resolution may be agreed to.

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE NEAR LOUISIANA, MO.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives, disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8918) granting the consent of Congress for the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Louisiana, Mo., and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment, accede to the request of the House for a conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Vice President appointed Mr. JONES of Washington, Mr. COUZENS, Mr. BINGHAM, Mr. FLETCHER, and Mr. SHEPPARD conferees on the part of the Senate.

AIRSHIP "LOS ANGELES"

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, there has been a very disquieting report in some of the papers about the condition of the gas bags on the airship Los Angeles. I send to the desk a resolution, which I introduce simply to make inquiry from the Secretary of the Navy regarding the matter. My purpose in doing this is that fears may be allayed. I assume, of course, that the airship is perfectly safe, but one of the articles to which I have referred would tend to create the opposite impression. I ask to have the article inserted in the RECORD and the resolution read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the resolution. The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 200), as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, requested to inform the Senate whether, in the opinion of the aeronautical experts of the Navy Department, the gas bags of the Navy dirigible Los Angeles are safe.

Mr. COPELAND. I know there can be but one answer to the question, because our Navy would not permit any airship to be used which was not safe, but the article which I have asked to have printed in the Record and others which I have read indicate serious criticism. I think it is only right that the Senate should take appropriate action in order that the country may be relieved of any anxiety regarding the matter. I therefore ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, would the Senator object to a reference of the resolution to the Committee on Naval Affairs? I am sure the committee will want to get the facts in the matter.

Mr. COPELAND. It is entirely satisfactory to me to have the resolution referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, assuming, of course, that the committee will get the information at once. I want to say to the Senator from Maine that I have no thought of criticism of the Navy in the matter. I have taken this action simply because serious criticisms had been made, and I think it is only right that the Navy should have an opportunity to answer such criticisms. I have no doubt satisfactory answer can be made. I am very happy to have the resolution referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. COPELAND. I ask that one of the articles to which I have referred may be printed in the Record at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The article is as follows:

[From the Washington Daily News, Monday, April 12, 1926]

"LOS ANGELES" GAS BAGS SAFE?—HUGE DIRIGIBLE'S LONG-DELAYED FLIGHT POSTPONED AGAIN PENDING TESTS

By John Wallace

Delayed flying plans, gas bags that have had to undergo strenuous patching and repairing to hold helium, the opinion of a leading aeronautical authority that leaky bags invite disaster similar to the Shenandoah's, and a muttered undercurrent of misgivings among some of the crew led yesterday to the fear that the Navy dirigible Los Angeles is not safe for flight.

Weather permitting, the Los Angeles is to be taken from the hangar at Lakehurst, N. J., late this afternoon and moored to the mast in the flying field.

The mammoth dirigible was to have taken the air Saturday for her first flight in nine months. That was the date set by the Navy Department.

Capt. George W. Steele, jr., commandant at Lakehurst, postponed it. It is doubtful if any flight will be made before the end of this week.

Mechanics and gas-bag experts, working feverishly 16 hours a day, spent the week end overhauling the ship. If she is tied up to the mast to-day she will swing there several days more, according to Captain Steele, while the various controls are adjusted and tested to minimize risk of mishap.

OFFICIALS MOVE CAUTIOUSLY

With the recollection of the Shenandoah tragedy still burning in their memories, the authorities at Lakehurst are moving cautiously.

Presumably, also, the bureau chiefs at Washington have learned certain lessons from perusal of the testimony taken at the Shenandoah inquiry.

The gas bags of the Los Angeles will retain their full equipment of valves, permitting the free escape of helium if the ship should be carried above pressure height. Capt. Anton Heinen, German dirigible expert, testified at the Shenandoah inquiry that the cutting down of the number of valves on the Shenandoah in order to save helium was directly responsible for the disaster that cost 14 lives.

Those responsible for the modification of the Shenandoah's valve system indignantly denied this and loudly denounced Heinen; but, nevertheless, they have let the valve system of the Los Angeles severely alone.

ONLY LOCAL FLIGHTS PLANNED

Among them is Lieut. Roland G. Mayer, who was chiefly concerned in making the change on the Shenandoah. Two months ago Mayer was made construction officer of the Los Angeles, succeeding Lieut. William Nelson, who was transferred to the Philadelphia station. Since then Mayer has been in direct charge of all the work of making the dirigible shipshape.

Another lesson, apparently, is that it isn't altogether wise for partly trained officers and crew to take an airship on a long flight.

Accordingly Captain Steele made known only local flights, with a return to the mast at Lakehurst field each sundown, will be attempted for at least two months.

"The idea," he said, "is to thoroughly train every officer and member of the crew before any long flights are made."

IS SHIP SAFE? IS QUERY

Yet with all this caution the question of the worth of the Los Angeles' gas bags will not down, and it leads inevitably to another query: Is the giant airship safe for flight?

The doubt arises from the rather general belief that the bags have not been handled in the last nine months with the care and skill their delicate texture requires. The doubt is raised by some of the members of the crew who have participated in and closely observed the overhauling and repairing that has been going on.

One who talked to Doctor Eckener, who built the Los Angeles and brought her here two years ago with a German crew from Friedrichshaven, quoted the expert as telling the officers at Lakehurst:

"These bags should last the life of the ship. They were made to do so. But you must handle them as you would a sheer silk gown, not as you would a flannel petticoat."

"You can stick your fist through the bags," one of the men who has been handling them declared earnestly the other day.

"They won't stay inflated longer than four hours," another asserted.

Through the courtesy of Captain Steele the reporter was enabled to go through the interior of the Los Angeles.

He found the outer surfaces of the gas bags literally sprinkled with patches some 6 to 8 inches in diameter. It was impossible to count them, because the bags were not inflated and hung in folds.

The largest of these bags when inflated are 90 feet in diameter and 45 feet long. There are 13 bags in the Los Angeles, with a gas capacity of 2,600,000 cubic feet, 450,000 cubic feet greater than was that of the Shenandoah. The outer covering is of a specially prepared cotton cloth. The inside of this is smeared with a sort of glue, the secret formula for which is known only to the German makers, and the whole interior is lined with gold beater's skin, which comes from the intestines of animals and which is impervious to air when in good condition.

BAGS STILL SAID TO LEAK

From the best accounts obtainable, the gas bags on the Los Angeles are not impervious to air, the goldbeater's skin having rotted in many spots.

For weeks the men at Lakehurst have been replacing the rotted parts with new strips of skin and putting patches on the outside of the bags. Yet, it is said, they still leak.

The facts as unearthed by the Daily News were laid before an American aeronautical engineer of national reputation. He stipulated that his name be not used, because he did not desire to engage in any controversy with the Navy Department, but this is what he said:

"I myself would not fly in an airship with leaky bags."

"By unending vigilance and attention on the part of the crew the chances are that any ordinary break that occurred in the bags could be repaired in flight."

ENGINEER POINTS OUT PERIL

"But there is always the possibility that a large break might occur. There would be greater likelihood of this if the ship were caught in a storm, carried above pressure height, and the escape valves were not able to take care of all the gas expansion. If one bag broke, the one next to it would be apt to break also."

What happened to the Los Angeles's gas bags?

Paraphrasing Doctor Eckener's neat figure of speech, the bags have evidently not always been handled as much like "sheer silk gowns" as like "flannel petticoats." Goldbeater's skin can be properly worked with only in a warm, moist atmosphere. In the German factories this work is done in rooms where the right temperature and humidity are scientifically and exactly maintained. Doctor Eckener and the German crew gave the Lakehurst men instruction in these things while they were here.

How much of it was heeded can at best be only a matter for conjecture.

Captain Steele stated that the repair work has been going on in a room the temperature and humidity of which have been properly adjusted.

"That is necessary, is it not?" he was asked.

"It is not necessary," he rejoined, just a trifle sharply. "But it is advisable."

Captain Steele's statement of the care used in working on the bags applied to the time they have been in Lakehurst. They were taken from the ship some eight months ago.

From a man who was in constant touch with what went on at Lakehurst at that time, the Daily News has learned that the bags were transported to the Philadelphia station.

JAMES MADISON MEMORIAL

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I hold in my hand an article by Arthur Deerin Call, entitled "Needed, a worthy memorial to James Madison," which appeared in the magazine Peace for April, 1926. I ask that it may be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

NEEDED A WORTHY MEMORIAL TO JAMES MADISON

By Arthur Deerlin Call

A monument points like a fixed finger to the ideals of its builder. The world rears monuments to its great and to its loved ones, in spirit honoring them and itself. America has many monuments, but among them all there stands no adequate memorial to "the greatest constructive statesman our country has produced"—James Madison.

It was Gaillard Hunt, editor of the writings of Madison and author of the best life of him—none too well written—who, in an address in Orange, Va., August 14, 1919, said: "James Madison was the greatest constructive statesman our country has produced." Upon this the one hundred and seventy-fifth anniversary of his birth, it is peculiarly fitting, therefore, to consider and to weigh the major services of this man.

OUR INTEREST IN THE SUPERLATIVE

The "greatest constructive statesman"! We, especially we Americans, it is said, have a weakness for the superlative. It gratifies us to be told that Demosthenes was the "greatest orator" of all time; that Solomon was the "wisest man" that ever lived; that the Washington Monument is the "tallest structure" of its kind in the world; that we are "the greatest nation" in all the earth; that the three "greatest statesmen" of the nineteenth century were Lincoln, Bismarck, and Cavour. Whatever the psychology, it pleases us to tag something in terms of the superlative. Sometimes our superlatives are justified and appropriately applied. Gaillard Hunt's superlative is of that kind.

STATESMAN DEFINED

A statesman is one who successfully links experience to the immediate needs and at the same time unto the enduring benefit of the State. Such was the man who led the raw recruits of 13 bickering States to victory in 1782 over the trained redcoats of Britain; who presided over the Federal Convention of 1787, and who served as President through the first eight years of our United States of America. Such was John Adams, the Patrick Henry of New England, bearer of the brunt of battle for independence, "Colossus of the debate," who later, in the midst of intrigue in his own Cabinet and faced with a great opposition in the negotiations with France, placed his fate in the hands of history and stood forth against his party, a great American. Such was Alexander Hamilton, who, as the first Secretary of the Treasury, "smote the rock of national resources and an abundant stream of revenue came forth," who "touched the dead corpse of the public credit and it sprang upon its feet." Such was Thomas Jefferson, author of the Declaration of Independence, of the ordinance of 1787, diplomat, learned in the arts and sciences, master of men, political genius, friend of the "man of no importance." All these were men who linked experience to the immediate needs and unto the future benefit of this country. They were statesmen.

But "the greatest constructive statesman our country has produced" was James Madison, because he, probably more than any other man, linked experience to the needs of the new Government and determined modes of growth and achievement of our United States, modes apparently permanent as they have been useful. Thanks largely to him our Constitution is to-day the oldest continuous constitution of the oldest continuous Government in the world.

LESSER FOUNDATIONS OF MADISON'S REPUTATION

Hunt's characterization of the "little man of Montpelier" is true, not because of Madison's services as the fourth President of these United States, from March 4, 1809, to March 4, 1817, the choice of Jefferson, who "loved him as a son," and who had retained him as Secretary of State through eight years; not because he was our war President through the war commonly known as the War of 1812; not because he was a modest man, free of all vainglory—a fact; not because of those last 19 years of private life, surviving his friend Jefferson by a decade; not because of the final pictures of him, meditative yet useful, amid his books and friends, farming, raising Merino sheep and other animals, condemning nullification and secession as in no sense akin to his Virginia resolutions, as, indeed, "twin heresies" which "ought to be buried in the same grave;" serving as rector of the University of Virginia.

After his death, June 28, 1836, there was found among his papers one entitled "Advice to my country." This document reads as follows: "As this advice, if it ever see the light, will not do so till I am no more, it may be considered as issuing from the tomb, where truth alone can be respected and the happiness of man alone consulted. It will be entitled, therefore, to whatever weight can be derived from good intentions and from the experience of one who has served his country in various stations through a period of 40 years; who espoused in his youth, and adhered through his life, to the cause of its liberty; and who has borne a part in most of the great transactions which will constitute epochs of its destiny.

"The advice nearest to my heart and deepest in my convictions is, that the Union of the States be cherished and perpetuated. Let the open enemy to it be regarded as a Pandora with her box opened, and the disguised one as the serpent creeping with his deadly wiles into Paradise."

Fine as is this utterance, it is not sufficient to stamp its author as "the greatest constructive statesman our country has produced."

James Madison was born March 16, 1751. One of his ancestors patented nearly 5,000 acres of Virginia, afterwards incorporated in the county of Orange. James, being the eldest of seven children—four boys and three girls—inherited this estate, afterwards called "Montpelier." Notwithstanding he was born in Port Conway, some 50 miles away, Montpelier was his home throughout his 85 years. He graduated from Princeton at 18, in 1769, doing his junior and senior work in one year. He then took one year post-graduate work in Hebrew and the study of theology, under Witherspoon, returning to his home to serve as teacher of his brothers and sisters. His studies in theology led him to revolt at the religious intolerance rampant in Virginia and elsewhere at that time. Among his writings of that period is a letter to William Bradford, Jr., of Philadelphia, in which the young man did, for him, an unusual thing; he let himself go. He wrote:

"But away with politics! . . . That diabolical, hell-conceived principle of persecution rages among some; and, to their eternal infamy, the clergy can furnish their quota of imps for such purposes. There are at this time, in the adjacent country, not less than five or six well-meaning men in close jail for publishing their religious sentiments, which in the main are very orthodox. I have neither patience to hear, talk, or think of anything relative to this matter; for I have squabbled and scolded, abused and ridiculed, so long about it to little purpose that I am without common patience."

Madison's first public service of importance was his championship of the principle of religious freedom, and of the prohibition for America of an established church—principles still standing in the Virginia Bill of Rights.

SUMMARY OF HIS LIFE

Continue the summary of James Madison's life. He became a member of the committee of safety in 1774—youngest member of the committee; a delegate to the Virginia constitutional convention of 1776, which he called his "first entrance into public life"; and then a member of the First Virginia Assembly under his State's new constitution, of the same year. Falling of election to the next assembly because he refused to canvass for the office, he was made a member of the governor's council. He was elected a delegate to the Continental Congress for 1780-1783. He was again a member of the Virginia Assembly in 1784, and again of the Continental Congress in February, 1787. He was a member of the Annapolis convention of 1786, of the Federal convention of 1787, and of the first House of Representatives, 1789-1797. He was the author of the Virginia resolutions of 1798, and still again a member of the Virginia Assembly in 1799-1800. He was Secretary of State under Jefferson from 1801 to 1809. He was elected President by the Democratic Party in 1808 and again in 1812. Save for his services as a delegate to the Virginia constitutional convention of 1829, March 4, 1817, marked the end of his 40 years of public life. But these facts in themselves, impressive as they are, do not warrant the claim that he is "the greatest constructive statesman our country has produced."

JUDGED BY HIS CONTEMPORARIES

Contemporaries recognized his greatness. When a joint resolution was reported by the Library Committee to the Congress to purchase the copyright of Madison's manuscript work, Senator Asher Robbins, speaking before the Senate, February 18, 1837, said:

"I consider this work of Mr. Madison, now proposed to be given to the world under the patronage of this Government, as the most valuable one to mankind that has appeared since the day when Bacon gave to the world 'Novum Organum.'"

The Senator closed with this:

"If, then, this appropriation was merely to express a nation's gratitude to a national benefactor, it would be the least it would become her to make. But besides that we are to consider that it is to purchase for this country and for mankind a treasure of instruction whose value no man can measure, no figures can express."

One of Mr. Madison's biographers, Sydney Howard Gay, says:

"If we may trust the reports of his contemporaries, though he wanted some of the graces of oratory, he was not wanting in the power of winning and convincing. His arguments were often, if not always, prepared with care. If there was no play of fancy, there was not forgetfulness of facts. If there was lack of imagination, there was none of historical illustration when the subject admitted it. If manner was forgotten, method was not. His aim was to prove and to hold fast; to make the wrong clear and to put the right in its place; to appeal to reason, not to passion nor to prejudice; to try his cause by the light of clear logic, hard facts, and sound learning; to convince his hearers of the truth as he believed in it, not to take their judgment captive by surprise with harmonious modulation and grace of movement."

Following Mr. Madison's death there was mourning throughout the country. Public meetings were held. September 27, 1836, there was such a meeting in the Odeon at Boston. The program of the exercises was as follows:

"ORDER OF PERFORMANCES IN THE ODEON, TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 27, 1836, OCCASIONED BY THE DECEASE OF JAMES MADISON, FORMERLY PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

"I. Voluntary on the organ: By G. J. Webb.

"II. Prayer by Reverend Doctor Lowell.

"III. Ode: By the choir of the Boston Academy of Music.

"(Poetry by Park Benjamin, music by G. J. Webb)

"How shall we mourn the glorious dead?

What trophy rear above his grave,

For whom a nation's tears are shed—

A nation's funeral banners wave!

"Let eloquence his deed proclaim,

From sea-beat strand to mountain goal;

Let hist'ry write his peaceful name

High on her truth-illumined scroll.

"Let poetry and art through earth

The page inspire, the canvas warm—

In glowing words record his worth,

In living marble mold his form.

"A fame so bright will never fade,

A name so dear will deathless be;

For on our country's shrine he laid

The charter of her liberty.

"Praise be to God! His love bestowed

The chief, the patriot, and the sage;

Praise God! to him our fathers owed

This fair and goodly heritage.

"The sacred gift, Time shall not mar,

But wisdom guard what valor won—

While beams serene her guiding star

And glory points to Madison!

"Eulogy by the Hon. John Quincy Adams.

"V. Hymn, O God, our help in ages past.

"VI. Benediction."

The address upon this occasion by John Quincy Adams, who himself had been President of these United States from 1825 to 1829, is a masterpiece of historical analysis and forensic power. Among other things, Mr. Adams remarked:

"Among the numerous blessings which it was the rare good fortune of Mr. Jefferson's life to enjoy was that of the uninterrupted, disinterested, and efficient friendship of Madison. But it was the friendship of a mind not inferior in capacity and tempered with a calmer sensibility and a cooler judgment than his own."

In conclusion he said:

"The Lord is in the still small voice that succeeds the whirlwind, the earthquake, and the fire. The voice that stills the raging of the waves and the tumults of the people—that spoke the words of peace, of harmony, of union. And for that voice may you and your children's children, 'to the last syllable of recorded time,' fix your eyes upon the memory and listen with your ears to the life of James Madison."

But nothing in all this would warrant us in calling James Madison "the greatest constructive statesman our country has produced."

THE LARGER EVIDENCES

The justification of this characterization of James Madison lies in the fact that he, probably more than any other man, let it be repeated, linked world experience to the needs of a national government, and determined modes of growth and achievement of our United States apparently permanent as they have been beneficent. He, more than any other man, brought about the call of the Federal Convention of 1787; he, more than any other man, was responsible for its success; and he, more than any other man, brought about its acceptance by the people of the States.

CALL OF THE FEDERAL CONVENTION

The period following the American Revolution was called by William Henry Trescott of that time, and later by John Fluke, "the critical period of American history." James Madison lived in that period, and sensed, perhaps as no other man, how critical it was. The war period from 1770 to 1782 was a period of combat. But war is a binding force. War unites a people. The recent World War united our America in one common aim. Following this war, however, we have been faced with certain outward-flying forces tending to disintegrate our unity of national purpose. This was particularly the case following the treaty of Paris, in 1783. Pessimism permeated the States, burdened with their debts because of the war. The Government was without credit. There were tariff barriers between States, Connecticut, for instance, taxing imports from Massachusetts higher than imports from Great Britain.

Some were carrying on war with the Indians—indeed, some warring with each other. Half-baked reformers then, as always, flooded the country with their weird panaceas. Organized bands were burning buildings in Carolina and carrying on a rebellion in Massachusetts. Property rights, law and order, union and self-government, liberty itself, seemed to be skidding to oblivion. Madison saw it all and determined to do everything in his power to stem the destructive onrush.

The chaotic condition of the commerce between the States was illustrated, for example, by what was known as the "Potomac question." Maryland's charter gave her jurisdiction over this river to the Virginia shore; but Virginia claimed the privilege of free navigation of the Potomac. Smuggling was a common practice. The evasion of State laws disturbed Madison, not so much because of the frauds themselves as because of the general weakness of the Confederacy, of which these were but symptoms.

Madison complained to Jefferson, then in the Continental Congress, suggesting that he confer with the delegates from Maryland about the matter. Jefferson complied with this suggestion. Madison then moved in the Virginia Legislature for the appointment of commissioners to meet with commissioners from Maryland. This meeting of commissioners took place in Alexandria in the spring of 1785. The meeting was of great interest to Mr. Washington, who had recently become president of the Potomac Co., the purpose of which was to make the upper Potomac navigable and to open up a good road to the Ohio River—all with the thought of encouraging emigration westward. It soon developed that the Potomac was of interest not only to Maryland and Virginia, but to Pennsylvania, and Delaware—indeed, to all of the States.

Because of the deplorable conditions of trade in Virginia, Madison was able to make use of the needs of the State in the interest of a conference of delegates from all the States. He prevailed upon the Virginia legislature to pass a resolution, the result of which was the call of a conference of commissioners of all the States to meet in Annapolis on the second Monday of September, 1786. On September 11 of that year commissioners from the five States of Virginia, Delaware, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and New York showed up.

The result of the conference of these commissioners was an address, written by Alexander Hamilton and signed by John Dickinson, urging a conference of delegates from all the States to meet in Philadelphia on the second Monday of May, 1787, "to devise such further provisions as shall appear to be necessary to render the Constitution of the Federal Government adequate to the exigencies of the Union."

Upon the initiative of James Madison, Virginia was the first to choose delegates to such a convention, the delegates being George Wythe, age 61; Edmund Randolph, age 34; George Mason, age 61; James McClurg, age 40; John Blair, age 55; James Madison, age 36; and George Washington, age 55. Had it not been for Madison, Washington would probably have never attended the convention.

SUCCESS OF THE CONVENTION

To James Madison is largely due the success of the Federal Convention of 1787. The convention had been called for the second Monday of May, 1787. Not until 11 days later, the 25th, did a quorum of the delegates make a session possible. On the third day of the conference, May 29, Mr. Edmund Randolph, of Virginia, submitted a plan for the organization of the Government. This plan was the only plan discussed throughout the convention. Our Constitution grew directly out of it. The man who first outlined the plan was James Madison, who in a letter to Edmund Randolph, under date of April 8, 1787, set forth his ideas of what the new Government should be.

Mr. Madison's place in the convention is familiar to everyone who has given any attention to that great event. Only two men addressed the conference oftener than Mr. Madison—Gouverneur Morris and James Wilson. It became more and more clear as the convention proceeded "that the first man of the assemblage was James Madison." William Pierce, a delegate from Georgia, kept some notes of his impressions of the convention. In one of these notes he wrote:

"Mr. Madison is a character who has long been in public life; but, what is very remarkable, every person seems to acknowledge his greatness. He blends together the profound politician with the scholar. In the management of every great question he evidently took the lead in the convention, and though he can not be called an orator, he is a most agreeable, eloquent, and convincing speaker. From a spirit of industry and application which he possesses in a most eminent degree he always comes forward the best-informed man of any point in debate. The affairs of the United States he perhaps has the most correct knowledge of of any man in the Union. He has been twice a Member of Congress and was always thought one of the ablest Members that ever sat in that council. Mr. Madison is about 37 years of age, a gentleman of great modesty, with a remarkably sweet temper. He is easy and unreserved among his acquaintances and has a most agreeable style of conversation."

This man Madison, later to be characterized by John Fiske as a political philosopher "worthy to rank with Montesquieu and Locke," was literally the center of the conference, for he chose a seat directly in front of George Washington, the presiding officer, with the other members on his right and left. He chose this place because, having had experience as reporter of the Continental Congress, he had set for himself the task of reporter of the convention. He was not absent a single day, nor more than a fraction of an hour in any day. He did not lose a "single speech, unless a very short one." In the midst of this remarkable labor he found time to write to Jefferson, "I have taken lengthy notes of everything that has yet passed, and mean to go on with the drudgery if no indisposition obliges me to discontinue it." It was given to Mr. Jefferson to read Madison's notes years after. Under date of August 10, 1815, he wrote to John Adams:

"Do you know that there exists in manuscript the ablest work of this kind ever yet executed of the debates of the Constitutional Convention of Philadelphia in 1787? The whole of everything said and done there was taken down by Mr. Madison with a labor and exactness beyond comprehension."

On reading the remarks of Madison throughout those laborious days, one learns to appreciate not only the faithful attention to detail but the large statesmanship of the man. "The people were, in fact, the fountain of all power, and by resort to them all difficulties were gotten over," he argued. It is in that spirit that he defended the plan of submitting the Constitution, the result of their handiwork, not to the legislature for ratification but to conventions of delegates specially elected by the people.

But, still more important, when confronted with the question whether or not the new Government should have power to coerce a recalcitrant State with force of arms, Mr. Madison said no. Such a plan was provided for in the Virginia resolution; but when the matter came up in the fourth session, May 30, Mr. Mason, according to Madison, "observed that the present confederation was not only deficient in not providing for coercion and punishment against delinquent States, but argued very cogently that punishment could not, in the nature of things, be executed on the States collectively, and, therefore, that such a government was necessary as could directly operate on individuals, and would punish those only whose guilt required it." Whereupon, the following day, Thursday, May 31, Mr. Madison observed:

"* * * that the more he reflected on the use of force the more he doubted the practicability, the justice, and the efficacy of it when applied to people collectively and not individually. * * * A union of the States containing such an ingredient seemed to provide for its own destruction. The use of force against a State would look more like a declaration of war than an infliction of punishment, and would probably be considered by the party attacked as a dissolution of all previous compacts by which it might be bound. He hoped that such a system would be framed as might render this recourse unnecessary, and moved that the clause be postponed."

The motion was, as he says, "agreed to nem. con.," and the subject, although subsequently brought before the conference in the session of June 15 by the New Jersey plan, was never again seriously considered.

There can be no doubt of Mr. Madison's influence upon the success of the Federal convention. One must agree with Bowers that "no one in either branch of Congress or at the head of any of the departments had approached his services in the framing of the Constitution."

RATIFICATIONS OF THE CONSTITUTION

Neither can there be any doubt of Mr. Madison's influence in getting the new Constitution acceptable to the States. He returned to the Congress in New York in November, 1787, led in overcoming opposition there to the Constitution, interested himself in the revenue bill, and introduced resolutions to establish three executive departments of the Government—a Department of Foreign Affairs, a Treasury Department, and a War Department.

In the first session of the first Congress, June 8, 1789, Mr. Madison moved the consideration of certain amendments to the Constitution. By these amendments he hoped to disarm the opposition to the Constitution, particularly in Rhode Island and North Carolina, not to mention his own State of Virginia. After consideration in committee and adoption by the Senate and House, 12 amendments were forwarded by the President to the States. Of these 12 amendments all but the first two were adopted by the States and declared in force December 15, 1791. They satisfied the general demand for a "Bill of Rights" and helped immeasurably toward making the new Constitution palatable to the States.

There remain two other reasons for crediting Mr. Madison with the ratifications of the Constitution. Of the 80 papers making up the Federalist, John Jay wrote 5; Alexander Hamilton, 51; and James Madison, 29. There is not time here to add more than to say that Mr. Madison's papers are in no sense inferior to those of his collaborators. He enjoyed the work. He would have written more had he not been called back to his State to aid there in the ratification of the Constitution. This leads to the other fact, that the ratification of the Constitution by Virginia, tenth thus to ratify, definitely settled the question of the acceptance of the Constitution by the Union. This achievement, too, was due primarily to the statesmanship of James Madison.

James Madison's title as "the greatest constructive statesman our country has produced" can therefore be briefly summarized. The cause of religious freedom in Virginia, afterwards extended in other States, was very appreciably advanced by James Madison. The call of the Federal Convention of 1787 can be definitely traced to the act of the Virginia Assembly in 1784, affecting trade on the Potomac River, an act introduced by James Madison; to the meeting of the commissioners in Alexandria and Mount Vernon in 1785, upon the initiative of James Madison; to the invitation to the Thirteen States for a meeting of delegates at Annapolis in 1786, promoted by James Madison; to the call for a convention of delegates to meet in Philadelphia in 1787; and to the approval of such a convention by the Congress, both because of the influence of James Madison. The success of that Federal Convention depended largely upon the plan, serving as a basis for the discussions of the convention, originally drafted by James Madison; upon the theory of the noncoercion of States, stood for by James Madison; upon the first 10 amendments, known as the Bill of Rights, drawn and successfully pleaded for by James Madison; upon the 29 papers in the Federalist written by James Madison; upon the ratification of the Constitution by the State of Virginia because of the victory over such men as Patrick Henry, powerful George Mason, James Monroe, Benjamin Harrison, and other Virginia giants of that day, by James Madison.

In his work Jefferson and Hamilton, Claude G. Bowers says of Madison: "There was not a man in America who was his peer in the knowledge of constitutional law or history." After Madison's first great speech in the Virginia Convention, June 6, 1788, John Marshall, who had listened to him, said in after years: "If convincing is eloquence, he was the most eloquent man I ever heard." Fisher Ames, jealous opponent of Madison, confessed him to be "our first man." In his book James Madison's Notes and a Society of Nations, Dr. James Brown Scott, after reminding us that "the Constitution of the more perfect Union has succeeded," suggests that if different States and kingdoms should be inclined to substitute the regulated interdependence of States for their unregulated independence "they need only turn for light and leading to the little man of Montpelier, who has preserved for all time an exact account of what took place in the conference of States in Philadelphia in the summer of 1787."

"Although the 'drudgery' of the undertaking 'almost killed him,' it is fortunately a fact that, 'by an authentic exhibition of the objects, the opinions, and the reasonings from which the new system of government was to receive its peculiar structure and organization,' we are now aware, as Mr. Madison then was, 'of the value of such a contribution to the fund of materials for the history of the Constitution, on which would be staked the happiness of a young people, great even in its infancy, and possibly the cause of liberty throughout the world.'"

IN CONCLUSION

In other words, James Madison is entitled to our special consideration, not because of any number of ordinary services to this Government, not because of the judgment of his contemporaries, but because he initiated the Federal convention of 1787, saved the convention, and, more than any other man, got our Constitution accepted at last by all of the States. No one has ever questioned James Madison's title as "Father of the Constitution."

We Americans, always interested in the principles of justice, in the rights of the individual man, in the abolition of arbitrary power, in the firm establishment of a government of laws and not of men, in the promotion of man's liberty along the bright highway between anarchy and tyranny, principles embodied in the Constitution, would honor both justice and ourselves, it would seem, were we to go about the business of rearing somewhere, somehow, a matured artistic conception of a worthy memorial to James Madison.

INDEBTEDNESS OF ITALY TO THE UNITED STATES

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6773) to authorize the settlement of the indebtedness of the Kingdom of Italy to the United States of America.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the Record at this point a letter by Frederick H. Allen, of New York, on the Italian debt settlement, which appeared in the New York World of this morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The letter is as follows:

[From the New York World, April 14, 1926]

THE ITALIAN DEBT SETTLEMENT

To the Editor of The World:

The excellent editorials appearing of late in the World, and the speeches made in the United States Senate, make it plain that the opposition to the Italian debt settlement is made up of two elements: (1) the "bitter enders" and "the last red cent" men, seeking, or pretending to seek, that which it is impossible to get; and (2) those swayed by their sentiments against Mussolini because of his dictatorship and the methods of government that have been established and enforced in Italy, which do not accord with their ideas of democracy.

We pride ourselves on being a practical people, and one of our cardinal political policies is not to interfere in the internal political arrangements of foreign states; yet, in opposing the Italian debt settlement we violate both of these concepts.

The settlement of the Italian debt has been put by the present administration on an entirely business basis. The Italian commission laid all its cards on the table, and, regarded from this point of view, the settlement with Italy, as shown by Mr. Mellon, obliges Italy to pay in proportion to her capacity an ever higher percentage of her budget expenditures than has been exacted from either the British or Belgians. In the case of England, the settlement amounts to 4.6 per cent of the total British budget; the Belgian settlement to 3.5 per cent; and the Italian settlement to America alone, 5.17 per cent, and to America and Great Britain 11.47 per cent. Whether the comparison be made with either the total foreign trade of these countries or their national income, the proposed proportionate payments to us by Italy are much greater than in the case of either England or Belgium. Certainly to oppose the settlement is to be not practical, for no one can imagine that another commission would be able to offer more than the one presided over by Signor Volpi. Thus, as a practical matter, Italy would surely feel she had done her best to reach a desirable and honorable settlement with us, and that, if it should be rejected, she would be under no obligation to make further effort. The result for our taxpayers would be that they would be getting nothing instead of something from Italy.

Some Senators say they consider the liberal settlements proposed would add to the prestige and power of Mussolini, and for that reason they would thus attempt to influence the internal policies of Italy by using the debt as a club. As a matter of fact, should our Senate defeat the settlement it would add greatly to Mussolini's strength, for Italy would then have nothing to pay and the popularity of Mussolini would be added to, just as did Mr. Wilson's interference in the Fiume matter at the Peace Conference add to the popularity of Sonnino and Orlando, for Mussolini, with his remarkable proved ability to dramatize events and appeal to the emotions of his people, would probably arouse an even greater enthusiasm than was shown those Italian representatives on their return home from the Peace Conference in 1919 and increase the bitter feeling against us that was then stirred up in that country. It is unfortunate that senatorial dignity and that courtesy due to a friendly people could be so far forgotten by our national representatives as was the case of Senator McKELLAR when he so vehemently and unthinkingly stigmatized Mussolini as a "bandit."

Another strained argument against the settlement is this, that it would increase the power of Mussolini and so help him in what are called his imperialistic tendencies, whereas the settlement would, on the contrary, have just the opposite effect, for the reason that he, having assented to pay to us the sum of $2,042,000,000, would be all the more bound to keep the peace in order to make the payments which thereunder Italy would be in honor compelled to make.

The statement of Senator JOSEPH ROBINSON, showing that in the proposed settlement the debt incurred by Italy to us prior to the armistice was really canceled, owing to the deferred payments and the low interest rates provided for; and the suggestion that he then made, that this debt be canceled and not be considered by us; that then by establishing a higher rate of interest on the balance, the postarmistice debt, we would in the end be as well or even better off financially, and in addition be credited for a wise and generous action, would seem to be a solution much to be preferred to the one adopted.

Democratic Senators opposing the settlement should ponder those words of Jefferson: "We certainly can not deny to other nations that principle whereon our Government is founded; that every nation has a right to govern itself under what form it pleases and to change these forms at its own will."

Napoleon said: "Statesmanship is only common sense applied to matters of great importance."

In the case of the Italian debt settlement, to allow prejudice to defeat the settlement would be both not practical and conspicuously lacking in common sense.

FREDERICK H. ALLEN.

NEW YORK, April 10.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I do not intend to detain the Senate at any great length in the discussion of the problems of the Italian debt settlement. There are a few observations which I would like to make in view of the fact that some of us were Members of Congress at the time the loan was made and recall very distinctly the debates which took place at that time. One of the most thrilling incidents in the life of our time was when President Wilson came to the Capitol and addressed the Congress on the impending war under date of April 2, 1917. Among many of the statements that thrilled those who heard him, I read the following:

American ships have been sunk, American lives taken, in ways which it has stirred us very deeply to learn of, but the ships and people of other neutral and friendly nations have been sunk and overwhelmed in the waters in the same way. * * * Only the vindication of right, of human right, of which we are only a single champion, will suffice.

In the discussion of the problems which would be involved he further stated:

There is one choice we can not make, we are incapable of making: We will not choose the path of submission and suffer the most sacred rights of our Nation and our people to be ignored or violated.

He further said:

It will involve the utmost practicable cooperation in council and action with the governments now at war with Germany, and, as incident to that, the extension to those governments of the most liberal financial credits, in order that our resources may so far as possible be added to theirs.

He also further stated:

It will involve also, of course, the granting of adequate credits to the Government, sustained, I hope, so far as they can equitably be sustained by the present generation, by well-conceived taxation.

The President further stated:

We are now about to accept the gauge of battle with this natural foe to liberty and shall, if necessary, spend the whole force of the Nation to check and nullify its pretensions and its power.

Mr. President, soon after this address was made Congress passed a joint resolution recognizing the existence of a state of war between this Nation and Germany, and then, in due course of time, legislation came before us to extend loans to our associates in the war. In the discussion when the loans were being considered there were many sharp criticisms, because there was no provision as to the terms and time of the repayment of the loans. In fact, some Members of the House of Representatives and the Senate sharply scrutinized all the provisions of the measures and at the same time caustically criticized the lack of such terms. I recall different Members answering those criticisms. The then distinguished leader of the majority in the House of Representatives from North Carolina explained the character of the loans. He also assured the country that the loans would be repaid. Mr. Kitchin then said:

The Secretary of the Treasury said, however, that he thought some of these governments would be able to meet their obligation in some four or five years after the loan was actually made and especially after peace. But we thought best—under all the circumstances and facts presented to us to leave the date of maturity to the discretion of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury. The date of maturity is going to be the same as the date of maturity in the United States bonds that we issue.

He is speaking now of the purpose of the committee—

That was the statement of the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee answering the criticism that the terms of repayment and the time of maturity of the loans were not fixed. Mr. Kitchin further said:

As I have said several times, I think, so far as I am concerned, I will not be bothered about that [the terms]. I believe we will be protected. The interest of the Allies to whom we loan the money and our interests will be protected by the President and by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Then the minority leader on the Ways and Means Committee, who at that time happened to be Mr. Fordney, of Michigan, made the statement that the obligations would be protected, and he also stated:

Their only purpose is to aid them—the Allies—in the best way possible to fight our battle across the sea without calling upon our men to go there. I do not believe that one single dollar of the money to be loaned to them as provided for by this bill will ever be used for the purpose suggested by the gentleman; if so, I would like to see some provision of law that would prevent it, because if they were to borrow this money from us and then retire outstanding bonds what they would have to do when in need of money would be to come again and sell their own bonds at a higher rate of interest than they are getting this money from us for, a thing not at all likely to be done by them.

I desire to quote these statements for two reasons: One is to dispel any possible idea that this was a mere gift; rather it was a loan and it was understood that in time the loans would be repaid. Mr. MADDEN, who now is the chairman of the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives, then gave assurance that that would be done, but at the same time he stated that it was so important that the loans should be made that, even though not a dollar of the money was ever repaid, our duty, nevertheless, would be to advance to our allies these loans.

One of the speeches that I recall very distinctly was made by Mr. RAINEY, now a Member of the House of Representatives, as he then was, in which he said:

We are making this loan in order to further our interests primarily in this World War, and from that moment when the Congress of the United States declared that a state of war existed between this country and Germany every blow struck at Germany by any of her enemies was struck also in our interest, because we have entered this war for the declared purpose of bringing it to a speedy conclusion, not for the purpose of territorial aggrandizement, not for the purpose of claiming for ourselves at the close of the war extravagant war indemnities.

I recall most distinctly the utterance of the chairman of the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives at that time, Mr. John J. Fitzgerald, of New York, who said, while he was sure the loans would be repaid, it was so important that they should be made that, even though he knew they never would be repaid, they should be made anyway.

I have before me also the utterances of distinguished Members of the Senate, including the distinguished senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], whose remarks have been quoted in this debate heretofore.

Mr. President, I have quoted the utterances of Members of Congress made at the time the loans were made in order that we might refresh our memory as to the fact that they were made as loans and not as gifts. There was no suggestion of that sort. I also have in mind in quoting the men who actively participated in the debate on the legislation to call attention to the fact that they realized the necessity of making the loans, despite the fact, as expressed at the time that there might be some difficulty in their collection.

I also have in mind the criticisms that were offered by some members of the minority side, then the Republicans, against the administration, which at that time was Democratic, because it did not specify a stipulation in the loans as to particular time of maturity and the terms of repayment. I did not share in that criticism at the time, believing as I did that the loans would be repaid, because I felt that no country could maintain its honor and credit by any step looking to a repudiation of its obligations.

However, some time elapsed—a period which some people think has been unnecessarily long—before steps were taken to adjust the loans. There is no question before us as to whether there should be any cancellation. That is a closed question so far as we are concerned. I do not think anyone believes that there is any basis for agitation to cancel the loans, either on the ground that they were extended as gifts, which they were not, or on the ground that the debtor nations are not in a position to pay. In other words, I believe it is better for the debtor, as well as for the creditor, that these loans should be regarded as sacred obligations, and I am quite certain that there is not a large number of people in the United States who take any other view than that.

The question with us is, Upon what basis shall the adjustment be made? Shall we take the position that every dollar, not only of principal but all the interest, shall be paid whether or not the debtor nation is capable of making such repayment? Mr. President, I do not believe any Senator would be, in my judgment, so short-sighted and so regardless of the welfare of our own country as to insist upon pushing a debtor nation beyond its ability to pay, and thus make possible a collapse and a total cancellation by forfeiture of the debt. Neither do I believe there is any Senator whose prejudices are so deeply grounded against any country that he would want to push that country beyond its ability to pay.

I assert that every consideration of sound economics, both for the debtor and creditor country, should lead us to adopt the policy of payment according to ability to pay rather than payment according to specific terms. In other words, I am convinced that the action of the administration in refusing to attempt to specify exact terms of repayment in 1919, when the money was loaned, because it could not be foretold what the conditions after war would be, was a wise policy and not properly subject to the severe criticism that was leveled against it at the time. On the other hand, I hold that the lapse of time has proven the wisdom of keeping open the terms of collection, and the ability of the nation to pay seems to me to be the sound principle upon which to proceed.

That is the position we have taken, as I understand, with Great Britain and every other country with which a settlement thus far has been made or proposed. In the case of Great Britain we canceled not $1 of principle, but her note is $4,600,000,000; and when it came to fixing the rate of interest there was a question as to whether we should concede anything to Great Britain below the ruling rate allowed on the Liberty bonds, 4½ per cent, for whatever reason—whether because of her industrial and financial condition, due to the war, or whether because in the anticipated future the rate of interest might rule less than it is ruling to-day. The rate of interest this Government is paying now is 4¼ per cent. We are going to give 62 years in which Britain is to pay the debt. The question was: Should we charge 4¼ per cent for the 62 years, the basis upon which we are paying interest now, or should we make a concession on interest? The decision, both by the commission and by the approval of Congress, was that we would make a concession, and instead of 4¼ per cent interest the rate that has been fixed is 3 per cent for the first 10 years and 3½ per cent for the next 52 years. If we take that on an average, there is a concession of interest from 4¼ to about 3½ per cent, which would be a reduction of annual rate of a little less than three-fourths of 1 per cent, and, rendered in actual percentage, that would be settling on the basis of about 83 per cent of the interest. Mark you, it is not a cancellation of a dollar of the principal. That is to be paid 100 per cent; but it is a concession of about 17 per cent on the interest, ranging below what interest ranges to-day.

That being the basis that has been adopted with all the countries except Italy, as to which we are making a very remarkable concession on interest, it at once becomes a question of keen debate and dispute. In the case of Italy not one dollar of the principal is canceled. In fact, the original principal was $1,648,000,000, but the principal upon which we are settling is $2,042,000,000. In other words, the interest on $1,648,000,000 at 4¼ per cent up to a certain time—December 15, 1922—is added to the principal when we come to settle the principal, remembering that every dollar of it is to be paid, not a dollar to be canceled. Then the question of concession of interest comes to us, as it did in the case of Great Britain. If we settled with Great Britain on the basis of 83 per cent of her interest, giving her a concession of 17 per cent, what concession, if any, should we make to Italy, and upon what basis should we make it?

Mr. President and Members of the Senate, I think that Italy, compared with other debtor countries should receive very favorable consideration from this body. She has a country half as large as France, with a population almost as large as that of France. She has not any raw material in any great quantity. About all she has is silk and water power and her labor, and her labor up to date has served as a chief element of revenue through the emigration policy of Italy. Since we have cut off the large immigration from Italy by our last legislation, that source of revenue, as far as our country is concerned, is almost entirely dried up. It is not dried up as far as Italy is concerned, of course, because Italy's emigration is going now into South America in great quantities. There will be revenue from that particular source in the future, but it will not come so much from the United States, as must be apparent to every Senator.

Mr. President, Italy has little if any coal. The United States in contrast has 43 per cent of all the coal mined in the world, and we use 42 per cent. Italy has no iron to speak of. The United States has 54 per cent of all the iron produced in the world, and consumes 53 per cent. Italy has very little if any copper. The United States produces 49 per cent of all the copper mined in the world, and consumes 44 per cent. Italy has no cotton. The United States produces 69 per cent of all the cotton produced in the world, and consumes 37 per cent of

It. Italy has little if any oil. The United States produces 64 per cent of all the petroleum produced in the world, and consumes 72 per cent. In other words, the United States is not self-sustaining in her production of oil.

These are largely basic elements in the tremendous wealth of the United States. All of them are lacking on the part of Italy. That is a feature that it seems to me ought to be included in the consideration of this subject as between the United States as a creditor country and Italy as a debtor country.

Mr. President, the United States has a wealth that is variously estimated at $380,000,000,000. Italy's wealth, according to the latest figures, is $22,300,000,000. Our wealth, therefore, is over seventeen times that of Italy.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, where does the Senator get his estimate of Italy's wealth at $22,000,000,000?

Mr. FESS. I took it from the Government actuaries' reports repeated by the Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot].

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say that we got that figure from Italy's own estimate of her value, and the other countries of the world also use the same identical figure.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the London Economist gives the national wealth of Italy at this time as $33,000,000,000. The World Almanac gives it as $35,000,000,000. Every authoritative publication that I know of, outside those that are interested in this debate, gives it as over $30,000,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, we had the Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Hoover, make a thorough examination as to the values that I quoted in my speech, and that was the report that the Secretary gave to the commission. Not only that, but I will say to the Senator that I have the official figures from the representatives of Italy, and they say that the total value of Italy is from $20,000,000,000 to $22,000,000,000.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the territory which they acquired during the war is estimated at almost one-half of the $22,000,000,000.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, the figures that I have given come from the actuaries of the Government and were verified by the statement of the Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot]. I have not thought it necessary to go further into that matter. I aim to deal with accurate statements rather than irresponsible utterances.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDGE. I might draw the further attention of the Senator to the estimate of the Bankers' Trust Co. of New York, which company, as the Senator knows, has branches all over Europe and elsewhere in the world. The Bankers' Trust Co. of New York estimates Italy's national wealth in 1923 as $21,500,000,000.

Mr. FESS. That is less than the figure I gave.

Mr. President, the estimated annual income of the United States is three and a half times the total wealth of Italy, which strikes me as one of the most startling statements that could be made in reference to the comparative wealth of the two countries. I am not offering that as a reason why there should be any undue concession. Just because our country is wealthy and is the creditor of Italy, not so wealthy, is the debtor, I do not mean to quote these figures to indicate that there should be undue concessions. What I have in mind is that the disparity in ability to take care of an obligation is so sharp and so great that I think it ought to be taken into consideration.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. FESS. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDGE. I do not want to disturb the Senator's train of thought; but in view of the fact that the Senator has stated that he was not using the wealth of the two countries as an argument except in passing by way of comparison, I might draw attention to the fact that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar] yesterday, in arguing against the settlement, very distinctly used the relative bonded indebtedness of the two countries as an argument against the settlement when he drew attention to the fact, which I think is entirely correct, that our bonded indebtedness incurred in the war is $20,000,000,000, as compared with Italy's bonded indebtedness of, I think, three and one-half billion dollars. That, of course, demonstrates that the bonded indebtedness in our case is practically five times as great as in the case of Italy; but when using that as an argument it is quite proper, it occurs to me, to use the national wealth also as an argument.

Mr. FESS. I thank the Senator for his comment.

Mr. President, so far as the relative wealth of the two countries goes, I think it should have very little effect upon our decision, save as suggestive of our policy, to wit: that the ability of the debtor country to pay should be the determining factor not only for the sake of the debtor country but also for the sake of the creditor country. If we insist upon a debtor country doing beyond its ability to do, it will repudiate the obligation that it owes; it takes no argument to convince anybody that as between total financial collapse and repudiation, the latter will be chosen rather than the former. From our standpoint, therefore, it seems to me it would be an unwise policy to push a country beyond its ability to pay, because we would probably lose the entire payment by giving the debtor government a basis upon which to make that decision, unwise as it would appear to me to be.

Mr. President, there are certain things that we as an interested creditor ought to have in mind in our consideration of what a debtor should do. In the first place, if the debtor should continue to spend more than it collected, and refuse to balance its budget, as many countries do, I should look with considerable sympathy upon the views of those who assert that we ought to be more rigid than we are; but that is not true with Italy. Italy is one of the few European countries that have adopted the plan of balancing the budget.

That may be either in increasing her production, which is under the limit of her natural resources, or in cutting off some of her expenditures. Italy is doing both of those things. I know countries in Europe that are not so much concerned about their expenditures, if we are to judge by the obligations they are making, but that statement can not be truly made about Italy. She is pushing her production to the very limit of her ability and she is reducing her expenditures down to the bone, and in that way has succeeded in balancing her budget.

There is another item which a creditor ought to take into consideration in regard to a debtor, and that is whether the debtor is put in such a position that it can know something definite about the amount of its obligations. So long as we fail to make an adjustment so that the debtor country knows precisely the size of its obligations, so long will indefiniteness continue, and so long will there be chaos so far as the fulfillment of future obligations goes.

That was one of the difficulties that faced Germany until the famous commission made its report. So long as Germany knew nothing about what she was to pay in the form of reparations, there was absolutely no possibility of putting the full capacity of German industry into action, but as soon as a definite plan was agreed upon, so that the debtor knew something about how large the obligations annually coming due were, they could make some specific arrangement to meet them.

That is the case with Italy, and one of our chief concerns as a creditor of Italy would be to make definite what her obligations to us are, so that she can make her plans to meet them. That is in her interest, and it will be indirectly greatly in our own interest.

I have insisted that no country will take the position voluntarily of repudiation, because of the economic effect, the penalty economically that would be visited upon it. Such a policy would drive all liquid capital out of the country and bar foreign capital from entrance. Therefore I believe that there is no doubt about every debtor country, including those which have not yet made their arrangements with us, making definite plans for the adjustment of the obligations.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Does the Senator feel reasonably assured that the plan which has been adopted for the payment of German reparations can be and will be carried out?

Mr. FESS. No one can be assured of it. There are now and then dispatches coming out of Germany which indicate her difficulty in making her next reparations payments. I do not know all the facts, but I am quite certain that the wisest course the interallied countries could make would be to make specific and definite that obligation.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator from Ohio thinks it is possible to make definite now the amount Germany can and will pay?

Mr. FESS. I have not the data on which I could make that statement.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator has made the statement, as I understood him, that until it is definitely ascertained what Germany will pay, it is impossible for German industry to resume full operations, implying, as I understood him, that the effect of the arrangement which has been consummated is to bring German industry back into full operation. What I ask him now is whether he feels, from all the information he has, that the plan which is in force at present will be carried out.

Mr. FESS. I am very hopeful that it will be.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. We are all hopeful, of course, but that is not quite responsive to my question, and if the Senator has information sufficient upon which to reach a conclusion respecting that point, I wish he would state to the Senate whether he believes that Germany can and will carry out the arrangement that is now contemplated with respect to the payment of reparations.

Mr. FESS. I do not have the data necessary for me to predicate a specific judgment on that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator plainly implies a doubt, at least he indicates, as I feel sure is the fact, that sufficient information is not now available to enable him to reach a reliable conclusion respecting the question I asked him. What effect does the Senator believe will result if Germany defaults finally in her payments of reparations under the Dawes plan, or under any other plan that may be agreed upon? What effect will that have upon the consummation of the Italian debt settlement? I do not mean upon the passage of this bill, but upon the actual carrying out by Italy of the settlement contemplated by the bill.

Mr. FESS. Whatever loss Italy must suffer by the failure of the small proportion of reparations she is to get will further disqualify her in ability to pay her debt to us.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. So that if a readjustment with Germany becomes necessary with regard to the amount of reparations she is to pay, another readjustment will be necessary with Italy in regard to the payments she is to make to the United States under this plan.

Mr. FESS. I think our commission very wisely has refused from the beginning to settle the obligation of any of these countries to us upon the condition that Germany is to pay any amount of reparations. I think that was a very wise decision on the part of the commission, because we do not want to become the collecting agency of these governments against any country.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield, so that I may interpose a question at this point with respect to German reparations?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does not the Senator from Arkansas understand that there is complete flexibility in the plan for the payment of reparations from Germany, and even though Germany might fail to make its next payment that will not absolve Germany from future payments?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly, Mr. President. The Senator from Missouri has indicated by his question that he has failed completely to grasp the significance of the questions I am asking the Senator from Ohio. The Senator from Ohio, I think, has fully comprehended my question. My point is that, taking the statement of the Senator from Ohio in response to my question, we are making a settlement by this bill which will possibly not be carried out for the reason that Italy's ability to pay depends in large part on Germany's carrying out the arrangement that has been made with respect to the reparations she shall pay to Italy, and if Italy does not receive the reparations contemplated from Germany, we will have to make a new settlement or revise our settlement with Italy.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I did not misunderstand the point made by the Senator from Arkansas, but my point was that the two things are quite dissimilar; that there is no relation between the two; that the settlement with Germany was a provident settlement; that time is not of the essence of that settlement; that if Germany fails to make a payment of reparations when the next one becomes due, it does not follow that she can not make the payment at a future time.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I understand that perfectly, Mr. President.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And that there is no provision, under this settlement, by which Italy—

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri surely can see that if there shall be a reduction in the amount of the reparations Italy is to receive from Germany, the principal source from which Italy is to derive the funds with which to carry out the settlement with the United States, the settlement contemplated by the pending bill, which is the payment of reparations by Germany, as there necessarily must be if Germany proves unable to meet the payments generally, then Italy will expect a readjustment of her settlement with the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, Mr. President, I do not misunderstand that, if the Senator please. The settlement with Italy is an independent settlement. The settlement with Italy, so far as the report of this commission is concerned, is predicated upon Italy's ability to pay, without reference to what moneys she may receive from Germany through reparations under the Dawes plan.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the Senator is mistaken. The Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot] said plainly in his speech to the Senate that Italy never could carry out this settlement if Germany defaulted finally in the payment of reparations due Italy under the plan now in force; that Italy must get the funds with which to carry out the settlement from German reparations. True, the commission did not embrace in the bill any provision relating to a modification of the settlement in case Germany should fail to pay Italy's reparations, but the Senator from Utah made it quite clear, and other Senators have done so, that the value of this settlement depends upon the amount of reparations which Germany shall pay to Italy.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President—

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I know it does not in contemplation of law. I understand the law in this particular. But in practical effect, if it be true that Italy can not pay the United States unless she collects reparations from Germany, then it follows that if the amount of reparations which Germany is to pay to Italy shall be permanently reduced the amount of the payments Italy will make to the United States will be correspondingly reduced, and we might just as well face the fact that we are making a settlement now which will probably have to be revised.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And in facing the fact it is just as well to have some knowledge of the plan to be worked out under the Dawes Commission.

Mr. FESS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Just a moment. I do not know what the implication of the statement of the Senator from Missouri is. I assume that the Senator from Missouri does understand the Dawes plan, but for the purposes of this argument it is not material what the exact detail of the Dawes plan is. If it fails to work permanently, or if future circumstances prove that Germany is entitled to a revision of the amount of reparations she must pay, if in time we come to apply the same yardstick to Germany that we apply to Italy, everybody knows that German reparations will be reduced. If we compare the amount of the indebtedness which Italy proposes to pay by this settlement, for instance, during the first 10 years, taking into consideration also the amount she must pay to Great Britain, with the amount of reparations Germany is required to pay in the next 10 years, it will be realized that the measurement that has been applied in the case of Germany is totally different from that applied in the case of Italy.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then my purpose was, though it may be that I do not know what we are talking about, to dissociate, if possible, the German reparation settlement and the proposed Italian settlement.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I agree with the Senator that legally the two are dissociated, but I assert that actually and as a matter of practical advantage the two are inseparable in the way the matter has been presented to the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But the payments under the Dawes plan will proceed. Time is not of the essence of those payments. If they can not pay now, they must pay when they procure marks with which to pay.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. But if they never procure them, they will not pay, of course.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And if they do not procure them, they would not pay and should not pay.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly; and then there will be a revision of the German reparations, and in truth that is what the world may expect.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not want the Senator to understand that my position with reference to the Italian debt settlement is based upon Italy's ability to pay. I do dissociate the two things in my own mind. I regard the Dawes settlement and the plan worked out under that settlement as equitable not only to the creditor nations of Germany but equitable to the people of Germany. I am not impressed with the present ability of Italy to pay as an argument why the settlement should be made.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the senior Senator from Missouri?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I understand the Senator from Ohio wants to emphasize the point that the proposed Italian debt settlement is a settlement that is, in the opinion of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson], one that is hard and fast; that we are basing it upon the ability of Italy to pay at this present time, and that hereafter if Italy is unable to pay she will not pay; but that in the German settlement, even if Germany is not able to pay to-day or able to pay next year, she does not thereby escape. The French say to Germany, "If you can not pay to-day or to-morrow, you have got to pay ultimately, anyway, when you are able to pay." That is the difference between the Italian settlement and the German settlement.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is wrong in his conclusions, I will say.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand the settlement as made under the Dawes Commission plan is responsive to a well-defined, well-understood, sound economic plan and depends upon the ability of Germany to procure, not in Paris nor in London nor in New York, dollars or pounds or francs, as the case may be, but is based upon the proposition that she receives at the Reichsbank in Berlin gold marks with which to pay.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield to me to ask the Senator from Missouri a question?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Does the Senator from Missouri think, or does he not think, that in effecting this settlement both the commission on the part of the United States and the commission representing Italy took into consideration the undertaking of Germany to pay reparations to Italy in determining the ability of Italy to pay the United States?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The only way I can answer that and the only information I have is from the press as to statements reported to have been made by Volpi when he returned from the United States and from Great Britain.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I shall have to decline to yield further except to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who has been trying for some time to secure my permission to interrupt. I yield now to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. For the Record and in order that the matter may be perfectly straight, I want to quote what I said on this question:

The commission did not neglect to make a careful study of Italy's interest in reparations and its effect on her capacity of payments. Reparation receipts, of course, represent a new credit to Italy in her international balance of payments. Up to the present time Italy's reparation receipts have not been relatively very large. There is no doubt, however, but that they have been of substantial assistance in enabling Italy to balance her budget and restore economic equilibrium.

Italy receives only 10 per cent of German reparations, against 52 per cent allotted to France and 22 per cent to Great Britain. To compensate Italy for the small percentage of German payments she was given 25 per cent of Austrian, Hungarian, and Bulgarian reparations. But Italy has been compelled to renounce practically all of these latter payments as her contribution to the reconstruction and restoration of her former enemy countries. She has received reparations in substantial amounts only from Germany. Up to August 31, 1924, when the Dawes plan went into effect, Italy had received 456,000,000 gold marks, all in the form of deliveries in kind, chiefly coal. Up to August 31, 1925, the end of the first Dawes-plan year, she had a credit on the books of the agent general of 66,000,000 gold marks, nearly all of which was applied to payment for deliveries of coal, coke, and allied products. Italy normally should receive 10 per cent of the Dawes-plan payments, but as prior to August 31, 1924, she received heavier payments than she was entitled to receive, her share is to be reduced during the next few years till the extra payments are absorbed. During the second Dawes-plan year, 1925-26, it is estimated that Italy will receive 84,000,000 gold marks; 1926-27, 77,000,000 gold marks; 1927-28, 127,000,000 gold marks; and 1928-29, 175,000,000 gold marks. It is expected that deductions from Italy's share will cease after 10 years, so that in 1935 and thereafter Italy should receive about 195,000,000 gold marks annually. When the normal yearly payments are reached, the distribution per capita of German reparations will be substantially as follows: Italy, $1.19; Belgium, $4.75; and France, $6.18. No one can deny that German reparations will largely provide Italy with the means of making the payments required under her debt settlements with the United States and Great Britain. This is a fact, whether we admit it or not.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Utah a question?

Mr. FESS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. If Italy is to derive from German reparations the funds with which to execute this settlement, and German reparations fall in whole or in part, does it not follow that Italy will default in the carrying out of this settlement?

Mr. SMOOT. I think if Germany defaulted wholly that it would be impossible, perhaps, for Italy to pay according to the terms of the agreement, but it does not relieve Italy of any obligation. At any time she is able to pay she has to pay. For instance, with reference to the situation as to Germany to-day, it is generally conceded that under the Dawes plan she will have to pay $10,000,000,000 to $11,000,000,000.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. How much does Germany pay during the first 10 years and how much does she pay annually?

Mr. SMOOT. I have not the list of payments here now.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I mean the total reparations under the Dawes plan?

Mr. SMOOT. I have not that figure here now. I have the original amount that they were to pay, but I have not the later figures.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They pay $625,000,000 a year.

Mr. SMOOT. We must remember that all of the German pre-war indebtedness was wiped out, and if she carries out the Dawes plan as contemplated and as generally understood she will have to pay about $10,000,000,000 to $11,000,000,000. France, of course, owes more than that to England and America, or approximately that with the interest added. Germany is more capable of paying her reparations than Italy is possibly capable of paying her indebtedness to the United States, not taking into consideration that she is owing England more than she owes the United States. But, of course, in the settlement the commission did not take into consideration that we were not going to get anything from Italy because of the fact that she was going to receive her reparations, but I do know that it will have a great bearing upon the ability of Italy to pay the United States.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Does the Senator from Utah feel that the same test of ability to pay was made as to Germany in the Dawes plan that is being made as to Italy in the pending bill?

Mr. SMOOT. I think upon the same financial basis and based upon the ability of all of the countries to pay.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Does the Senator think that Germany is as able to pay $625,000,000 a year in reparations as Italy is to pay the United States $5,000,000 a year in debts and Great Britain $20,000,000 a year in debts?

Mr. SMOOT. That, of course, is only the beginning. I will say to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator does not pretend to say that it is practicable or possible now to measure the ability of Italy or any other country to pay 25 or 62 years from now?

Mr. SMOOT. No.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The conclusion the committee reached was based entirely upon existing conditions.

Mr. SMOOT. No; not entirely, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Existing facts and conditions reasonably to be expected.

Mr. SMOOT. We have one settlement plan with a country that was absolutely impossible for it to carry out, and it had to ask an extension of time on $3,000,000.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I think I shall have to decline to yield further.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think the Senator from Ohio is entitled to resume his speech.

Mr. SMOOT. I apologize to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. It is perfectly proper, because Senators have brought out phases of the discussion that I think every Senator wanted to hear.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. SWANSON. This settlement has been invoked as being similar to the Dawes settlement, and it has been so claimed in order to give this settlement recognition and support in the country, but I think there is a difference between this settlement and the Dawes settlement. I would like to have the Senator explain if my impression is not true.

Mr. FESS. I would be glad to do that. Probably I was unfortunate in using my illustrative material.

Mr. SWANSON. Let us see if this is true—

Mr. FESS. Let me state it, and let the Senator see whether I am accurate or not. I had made the statement that certain things should be done in a debtor country and that the creditor country should be interested in those things being done. One was that the budget must be balanced. Italy has done that. The other was that obligations ought to be distinctly stated, and there I used the Dawes plan as an illustration.

Mr. SWANSON. My objection to the plan is that it is not in accordance with the Dawes plan. If I understand the Dawes plan correctly, it did not have anything to do with the ultimate payment that Germany had to make in reparations and it did not affect the $32,000,000,000 of reparations that must be cared for. The Dawes plan, as I understand it, determined the capacity of Germany to pay yearly. The Vice President deserves a great deal of credit for having effected that plan. The Dawes Commission determined that Germany could pay so much yearly. It did not affect at all the ultimate payment that Germany ought to make. The payment of $32,000,000,000 was not affected by the Dawes plan.

My objection to the Italian debt-settlement plan is that it fixes the annual payments at so much a year, and at the end of 62 years the debt is canceled. That is the difference between this plan and the Dawes plan. The Dawes plan provides for $600,000,000 a year, and leaves the question of ultimate payment to the developments of the future.

Mr. FESS. I think I shall have to decline to yield until I make one or two statements, because I do not want this speech of mine to be made by my colleagues.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield just a moment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. FESS. I must decline to yield, and I do so as genially as the Senator asked me to yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think the Senator from Ohio has been very generous.

Mr. FESS. As I recall, the Dawes plan was based upon four fundamental principles that are easily understood when clearly stated. The first one was that Germany must subject herself to as heavy taxation as the Allies. In other words, she can not decline the payment of reparations and at the same time refuse to adopt a rational taxation system. That is the first principle, and Germany acceded to it.

The second principle was that the Allies must be willing to loan $200,000,000 of actual specie as a basis for a new issue, that the depreciated mark might have substituted for it a mark that is worth its face value, because it would be redeemable. It was not only provided that the specie must be actually delivered, but it had to be delivered by the Allies, because the Allies must be interested in the restoration of Germany or she would not be restored. That was the second provision. The United States not only agreed to loan 50 per cent of the entire amount, but when she agreed to loan $110,000,000 of the $200,000,000, it was oversubscribed, I understand, thirteen times in about as many minutes.

The third provision was—and this is what the Senator from Virginia had in mind—that Germany, with those conditions established, must be willing to pay to the extent of her ability the reparations that had been stipulated.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. FESS. The fourth item was that with those conditions met, France must be willing to evacuate the occupied portions of German territory.

Mr. SWANSON. My contention was that the Dawes plan simply fixed the amount of yearly payments. The ultimate payment was not affected at all by the Dawes plan. I say the trouble with the present proposed plan is that it fixes the ultimate payment which it is said is necessary for Italy, and does not say it is necessary for Germany. I am willing to vote for the settlement if it shall be confined to yearly payments, and let the ultimate payment in 62 years be on the basis of the Dawes plan with reference to the future payment by Germany.

Mr. FESS. We are not going to dispute about what is the opinion of the Senator from Virginia. It is only the opinion that I am expressing that I want to get before the Senate, and I have stated that. I use that illustration as evidence of the wisdom of our definitely specifying Italy's obligation to us, and I repeat that until settlement is made, so that Italy shall know what her obligation is to be, there is no economic recovery possible in Italy to the fullest extent.

The third view that I have is that our ability to collect the debt will largely depend upon the progress of Italy and her ability to secure necessary liquid capital, for she does not possess it herself, and everybody is aware why she does not. It must depend upon her ability to get credit from other countries, and ours is the country from which it is possible for her to obtain credit. Until Italy has made her stipulation to pay, so long as there is anything uncertain about the fulfillment of her governmental obligation there is no possibility of private capital going to Italy.

For that reason it is to the interest of Italy first, and to our interest indirectly, that Italy be met on the basis of her ability to pay and that the contract be closed. She has balanced her budget, which is good. We are to specify definitely what she is to pay, which is wise. Then private capital will ultimately flow into Italy to reinvigorate her industries and enable her to produce and sell in order that she may have the wherewithal with which can pay the debts which she owes. It seems to me that those propositions are fundamental, and two of them depend upon our action.

The Senator from Arkansas raises a question now of Italy's ability and purpose to pay. We have no purpose to involve the payment of German reparations as a condition to receiving our payment, but it is true that if reparations are not paid, small though they be—for only 10 per cent of the reparations to be paid will go to Italy—it goes without saying that Italy's ability to pay her debt in that degree is going to be crippled. Nobody wants to deny that, but we do not take England's view. Italy owed to England a much larger debt than Italy owes to us, yet England settled the debt at a much less figure than is called for by our settlement with Italy and wrote into it a condition making it dependent upon the payment of German reparations. We did not do that, and I do not think it would have been wise for us to have done so, for the reason, as I said a moment ago, that we as a Government are not going to become the collecting agency of any government in Europe. The considerations which I have mentioned, it seems to me, ought to argue very strongly here for the expedition of this proposed legislation.

The Senator from Arkansas also suggested that we shall have to revise this settlement. That may be, but that is no reason at all why we should not make the settlement now. It seems to me it is an argument that we ought to make the settlement upon the data that we have at hand as to the ability of Italy to pay; and if a revision is impelled by considerations that may develop later, we shall meet that question when it arises.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield to me?

Mr. FESS. I yield to the junior Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Of course, if any of the nations which are debtors to the United States are dependent for meeting their obligations to us in part upon the payments received from Germany, then the same principle would apply to France and to England, and there might be a temporary revision from year to year to meet the contingencies which possibly might affect the payments from those countries.

Mr. FESS. I thank the Senator for that observation. What he has stated is absolutely true.

Mr. KING. I agree with the Senator that that ought not to be a reason for failing to enter into this settlement.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, it does not make the settlement less desirable, because it may be necessary to revise it; in fact, it makes it more desirable, I should assume.

Mr. FESS. That is true.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the bill itself provides for that. It provides that whenever a country can not pay one year, upon a certain length of notice it may be excused from paying for a period of two years.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, there is another consideration that appeals to me immensely in reference to this particular settlement. That is the character of taxation that Italy has adopted and from which her people are now suffering. Some of the governments in Europe, as I suggested a moment ago, have tried to avoid heavy taxation. They have avoided it to a point where it has become a subject of very severe criticism from this side of the water from those who are creditors of those nations. However, that is not the case as to Italy. It seems to me that her taxation system is tremendously burdensome; in other words, every conceivable source of revenue that the Italian Government can find has been sought out, and taxation is so heavy that I wonder how the people get along under the burden. Consider our own system of taxation. Mr. President, if the exemptions in our income tax law should be applied to Italy and salaries and incomes below that exemption were not subject to taxation in that country, there would be more taxpayers—and I want the Senate to get this—there would be more taxpayers having incomes above the exemption in the city of Chicago alone than in the entire Kingdom of Italy. In other words, their taxation is so burdensome that it goes into the very recesses of every source of wealth.

Mr. President, we are the first country in all the world in agriculture. Italy is way down on the list, because she is very poor in agricultural ability. She can not produce the food she needs, and any country that must buy the necessities of life in order to subsist is in an unfortunate situation, unless that deficiency can be recouped in some other way.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. FESS. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. In that connection has the Senator called attention to the large purchases of the products of the farm made by Italy from the United States?

Mr. FESS. I have not done that; but the Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot] covered that subject and did so in a very exhaustive manner, and presented comparative figures.

Mr. COPELAND. It seems to me, Mr. President, that it would add strength to the argument of the Senator if at this point the fact were brought out that last year Italy bought from the United States $91,000,000 worth of cotton, $26,000,000 worth of wheat, $8,000,000 worth of oil, $28,000,000 worth of copper, all from the fields and mines and wells of this country.

Mr. FESS. I did not repeat those figures because they were dealt with exhaustively by the Senator from Utah the other day; but they are very pertinent, I will say to the Senator from New York.

Mr. President, I was about to say that in transportation facilities and their extent we are the first country in all the world; we are first in mining and manufacturing of all the nations of the world, and we are first in our banking resources, having about three-fifths of the banking resources of the entire globe. We are also first in managerial ability and in the organization of industry, and first in the initiative of labor. In other words, America does not only possess all the basic elements at the bottom of great material wealth, but is first in every single one of them. Italy is a country that is away down in rank in all of these basic elements, and she owes us a tremendous amount of money; one-tenth of her total wealth is owing to us in cash. Due, I believe, to the obligation we owe to the citizens of America, we can not give such an amount of money to any country; we have got to regard the debt as an obligation which must be respected, and we are proposing by the pending settlement bill to have every dollar of the principal paid; but when it comes to paying the interest, stretching over 62 years, in the face of Italy bending under her system of taxation in order to make her budget balance, resorting to every element of industry in order to produce to the maximum, cutting to the very bone in her expenditures, and at the same time respecting her obligation, the question comes to me, Shall we make a concession in the interest charge?

The settlement now under consideration provides for the payment of 100 per cent of the principal. We conceded to Great Britain 17 per cent of the interest; but the pending proposal is to concede to Italy a much larger percentage than to Great Britain, and I think it is justified. I shall not for a moment hesitate in voting for the proposal, and I shall do so as one who was in Congress when the loans were made, with the understanding that they were never to be considered a gift, but that they were to be considered an obligation, sacredly regarded and to be repaid. I was one who wondered why we should not enter into specific stipulations at the time, but was convinced, under the leadership of Woodrow Wilson, that that was not the time for us to make such terms. I do not think now it lies in the mouth of any Member of the Senate to say that we ought, after eight years, to quibble about what the terms shall be, but that the settlement should be based on the ability of the Government to pay. Anything else is unwise from the standpoint of America and would be unwise from the standpoint of the debtor country.

MATERNITY AND INFANCY ACT

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, unless some Senator desires to discuss the Italian debt settlement bill, it is my intention to speak very briefly on another matter.

Mr. President, recently I addressed inquiries regarding the work under the maternity act to the proper authorities in cooperating States, and asked permission in an address before the Senate on this act to append the replies and the summaries of the work in these States, as a part of my remarks, with the headings I had supplied. That permission was granted by the Senate. I had not at that time assembled the replies in proper shape for publication. They are now ready, and I present them for insertion in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

I asked these State agencies also for a few copies of letters which they might have received from mothers who had experienced the benefits of the act, or from others who had observed its operation. Quite a number of these were sent me, and I shall be glad to show them to anyone desiring to see them. On account of the large number, I shall not ask to place them in the RECORD at this time. I may read some of them to the Senate later.

It is hardly possible to examine these replies and summaries from State agencies and these letters of comment without an increasing appreciation of the importance and the necessity of this work. The replies and summaries I present cover the work of the 43 States and of the Territory of Hawaii, cooperating with the National Government under the maternity and infancy act.

As to the present status of the measure, let me add that, after consultation with the Budget Bureau and the President, the Secretary of Labor transmitted to Congress a recommendation for the continuation of the appropriations under the maternity act for two additional years. The act itself is permanent legislation. The appropriations, however, when the act first passed in 1921, were limited to five years, beginning June 30, 1922. The bill authorizing further appropriations passed the House a few days ago by the overwhelming vote of 218 to 44. It came to the Senate, and was referred to the Senate Committee on Education and Labor. I understand that this committee has voted adversely on the bill. It will be brought before the Senate, however, for discussion and decision during the present session.

I again ask permission to insert the replies and certain summaries in the RECORD as a part of these remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

ALABAMA

ALABAMA STATE BOARD OF HEALTH,
Montgomery, March 3, 1926.

Senator MORRIS SHEPPARD,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In reply to your circular letter of February 19, I am giving you the following summary of accomplishments in Alabama through activities under the Sheppard-Towner Act and inclosing a few excerpts from the narrative reports of the 29 nurses who are employed under this act.

The per capita expenditure for activities in the interest of maternal and infant hygiene has increased from 0.0056 in 1921 derived from State and Red Cross funds to 0.0204 in 1925 derived from State and Federal funds.

Alabama was admitted to the United States death registration area for 1925 on a test of 1924 records. A test of birth registration is under way.

Prenatal supervision of expectant mothers has been undertaken in 28 counties, together with an educational program covering the hygiene of infancy and preschool-age children. The practice of midwifery has been brought under control in these counties.

Very truly yours,

JESSIE L. MARRINER,

Director Bureau of Child Hygiene and Public Health Nursing.

ARIZONA

PROMOTION OF THE WELFARE AND HYGIENE OF MATERNITY AND INFANCY, STATE OF ARIZONA,
Phoenix, March 8, 1926.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,

United States Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Your letter of February 19 was received in due time. Please pardon the delay in answering it, but some of the material which I wished to include was not available.

Herewith I am sending considerable material in the shape of reports and copies of letters, and you can use such of it as seems adapted to your purpose. In making copies of the letters I have not attached the names of the writers. Since these letters were written to me in strict confidence, I do not feel at liberty to reveal the identity of the writers. I am, however, quite willing to make affidavit as to their correctness and authenticity and the fact that the originals are in the files of this office.

Please be assured that I am very grateful for your interest and cooperation in endeavoring to secure a continuation of the Sheppard-Towner program.

Sincerely yours,

Mrs. CHARLES R. HOWE,

Director Child Hygiene Division.

ARKANSAS

ARKANSAS STATE BOARD OF HEALTH,
BUREAU OF CHILD HYGIENE,
Little Rock, March 26, 1926.

Senator MORRIS SHEPPARD,

Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Your letter of February 19 which was sent to Doctor Koenig would have had more prompt attention, but Doctor Koenig was in the field, which may account for part of the delay.

I do not believe any intelligent person who is reasonably well informed regarding the operation of the Sheppard-Towner Act in Arkansas would hesitate to say that it has been accepted with enthusiasm and has met a very urgent need.

You will also find a copy of the "Arkansas Family Series," under separate cover. Reference is made to it in many of the letters, so we send it in order that you may see what type of literature is being published and distributed as a result of this act.

The Arkansas Medical Society has approved the Sheppard-Towner Act and has indorsed the State board of health in its administration of same.

We are very grateful for your efforts in securing public health and welfare legislation, and we hope that you will be successful in establishing the Sheppard-Towner Act as firmly as are some of the agricultural subsidized acts.

Very respectfully,

STATE BOARD OF HEALTH,
Bureau of Child Hygiene.

Special Agent, Children's Bureau.

CALIFORNIA

CALIFORNIA STATE BOARD OF HEALTH,
BUREAU OF CHILD HYGIENE,
San Francisco, Calif., March 5, 1926.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,
Member United States Senate,
Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SHEPPARD: I take pleasure in sending the material which you have requested from women of the rural area of California. I have included a number of letters coming from different small towns showing how widespread the appreciation of the opportunity developed under the Sheppard-Towner Act.

I inclose, too, a brief statement which we have prepared of the work which has been accomplished during the past three years in California.

Upon receipt of your letter I wrote to various health officers and others in the State who have been closely connected with maternity and infancy work in California, asking them for an expression of opinion as to the value of the work in their communities. When I receive these answers I shall take pleasure in forwarding them as well.

We are looking forward with every hope to the continuance of the Sheppard-Towner bill over a longer period, knowing that it has stimulated many local communities to work on their own behalf and that with longer time we may show material results in our maternity and infancy mortality rates.

Sincerely yours,

ELLEN S. STADTMULLER, M. D.,
Director.

CALIFORNIA ACTIVITIES UNDER THE SHEPPARD-TOWNER ACT

Administrative agency: State board of health, bureau of child hygiene. Staff: Director, physician-lecturer, supervising nurse, 2 maternity-home inspectors (nurses), 4 clerks (1 vital statistics), 18 public-health nurses in 12 counties, on part pay from Sheppard-Towner funds.

Activities up to December 31, 1925: The State nurses supervised the work of the field nurses for maternity and infancy. These field nurses have organized 56 permanent and 14 temporary health centers, in which 40,412 children have been examined. (These figures include some but not all of the children examined during the preschool campaigns.)

Dental conferences and little mothers' classes have been held in a limited number of localities.

State survey of midwives: Three hundred and fifty-six found, of which one hundred and eleven were licensed to practice.

State physicians have examined children in the past year, using this means to stimulate interest in permanent child-health centers and to launch new work of this kind. Lectures to organizations to fill demand for educational work. One physician constantly employed, speaking on child hygiene to groups of men and women, reaching over 10,000 people in the past year. These talks occasionally precede or follow child-health conferences. Prenatal round tables also offered. Sets of prenatal letters have been prepared. These were first distributed to 5,500 physicians of California. Up to the present time 8,678 sets have been sent to mothers.

Inspections: In September, 1925, the bureau of child hygiene assumed the work of inspecting maternity hospitals and homes, making recommendations to the State board of health for license. There are 353 known institutions to be visited. New homes are constantly springing up. This offers a large field for prenatal education and improvement of confinement care.

Educational exhibits have been arranged at fairs, food shows, in well-baby weeks, and in connection with women's organizations.

Eleven new pamphlets have been prepared; 314,877 pieces of literature have been distributed, making an average of 8,745 a month for 36 months.

COLORADO

COLORADO CHILD WELFARE BUREAU,
DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC INSTRUCTION.

Senator MORRIS SHEPPARD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Sir: We understand a bill for an appropriation for the years 1928 and 1929 for the extension of the maternity and infancy act is now before Congress and that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House of Representatives has already granted a hearing to the supporters of the bill.

Knowing you to be coauthor of the maternity and infancy act, we are writing you to place before you the benefits of this work to Colorado that you may use the information when the bill comes before the Senate.

Before this Federal act went into effect the only work done in Colorado for mothers came under the mothers' compensation act, which in no way covers the ground of the maternity and infancy act, but does go to show our legislators were alive to the fact something had to be done for the mothers in this State. Since the passage of the maternity and infancy act Colorado had written into its statutes a "maternity act" which seeks to provide for a mother six months before the birth of the child until six months after. This maternity act is part of the dependency act of 1923 and is for the sole purpose of relief. This law does not provide for the big, broad, educational work of the Federal act. It reaches the particular individual at a crisis but does not teach our young women the glories of perfect motherhood nor bring to their consciousness the miracle of bringing into the world a healthy, happy child in a healthy, happy way as is taught under the maternity and infancy act.

The spirit of the Federal act is to give to the prospective mother knowledge of herself and the needs of the coming child. We have tried to carry this out in Colorado. Through the courtesy of the Woman's Farm Bureau of the Colorado Agricultural College we have given classes in prenatal infant and child care to the farm women. Other women in the rural communities have been gathered together through the various church aid societies, parent-teacher associations, and women's rural clubs and given lessons on maternity hygiene. Lack of knowledge along these lines is appalling. The consequent mistakes, heartaches, and tragedies are even more appalling.

A most outstanding angle of maternity work in Colorado has been in giving the services of a gynecologist to rural communities. The women on our dry lands as well as those in the mountain districts are seldom able to go to a specialist for examination. They do remarkably well to keep the current family doctor bills paid up. There is always the great drawback of shyness or timidity in having the local doctor make the examination. Whatever the cause of past carelessness in seeking knowledge of themselves we find these women extremely keen to learn the reason of their constant pain and ill health from the gynecologist. In one little town of about 600 population 19 women were examined by this woman specialist. There were three prenatal cases in almost completed term who had not yet seen a physician regarding their condition and only expected to call one in in case of an emergency. The other 16 cases were the results from injuries from childbirth, barrenness, depletion through having so many children under unfavorable circumstances, tumor, cancer, etc. After the examinations the follow-up nurse from the bureau made contact with physicians regarding the cases whenever the patient would allow her to do so. Before the week ended the prenatal cases had all been arranged for and one woman had gone into Denver to her old family physician for an operation for carcinoma. She also established "mother's classes" in the town. This work with the mothers as individuals is the heaviest educational work done in the maternity and infancy division of the bureau, but at the same time the most appreciated by the women themselves.

In our maternity and infancy health conferences we found great numbers of adolescent girls developing goiter. It developed that goiter in women and children exists to a startling degree in large areas in our State. Babies as young as three months old were found to be afflicted. Through heavy publicity in every locality visited by the health conference goiter and its prevention became a subject of common concern and preventative measures have since been adopted in all these communities.

Another important maternity and infancy activity is our campaign on breast feeding. The good done in training mothers in the care and feeding of infants is inestimable. Our feeding cases have been countless owing to outstanding programs on diet for the mother and the child.

The greatest friends to the maternity and infancy work in Colorado are the doctors. It is only when they are in favor of a program that we go into their community. They have been our staunchest friends and most constant supporters.

Inclosed are copies of some letters from a few of the leading physicians in the rural sections of our State showing their attitude toward our endeavors to help mothers and their children.

Maternity and infancy work is bound to grow and grow. It is popular, humane, and of vital necessity. There is a real place for all its activities in Colorado, and Congress will surely see that it continues. One can not picture a single Congressman who would not give to the women of his State the advantage of every bit of knowledge that would make of her a more perfect mother.

In our printed report of 1923-24 you will find a summary of the number of conferences, established stations, classes for mothers and girls, and the number of children examined. The gynecologist and the better rounded clinics have been developments of the work of 1925 and 1926.

With a firm belief that Congress will be friendly toward this great boon to womankind, I am,

Most sincerely yours,

ESTELLE N. MATHEWS,
Executive Secretary.

DELAWARE

PROMOTION OF THE WELFARE AND HYGIENE OF MATERNITY AND INFANCY, STATE OF DELAWARE,
Dover, Del., April 13, 1926.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,
United States Senate Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR SHEPPARD: In replying to your letter inquiring as to the value of the Sheppard-Towner funds assigned to the State of Delaware, it is my great pleasure to state that through this fund a great many babies' lives have been saved. While the death rate compared with other States' death rate is still high, nevertheless there has been a steady decline from a much higher death rate.

Through these funds one of the most valuable educational services has been performed, namely, convincing a more or less reluctant public that a small State like Delaware had a serious problem in high maternal and infant deaths, and that the remedy was procurable through public funds. The dissemination of health education can not be overestimated. At the State health centers physicians and public-health nurses hold weekly conferences, and the public-health nurses visit the homes of every known prenatal case and deliver birth certificates to all new-born children. These visits are always accompanied by valuable information and instruction. The service is state-wide, includes the city of Wilmington, and therefore leaves little opportunity for missing any mother or child.

Those of us who know Delaware conditions know that the Sheppard-Towner funds are just beginning to function satisfactorily for the further decline in maternal and infant deaths. Undoubtedly it would mean a great sacrifice in the lives of mothers and babies to have this fund unavailable after the five-year period, and it is to be hoped that Congress may see fit to continue this fund for a longer period in order that the gains made during the past five years may be permanent gains.

It is well recognized in Delaware that the mothers of the State appreciate the value of the work that has been possible through the Sheppard-Towner funds. During a recent session of the legislature, when it seemed that a reduction in the State appropriation was pending, the mothers of Delaware from the northmost to the southmost boundaries flooded the senate and house with personal appeals for the appropriation.

Delaware mothers and babies still need this help. May your good offices, Senator SHEPPARD, which have been so successful and meritorious in the past in promoting this national life-saving purpose, again serve this State and your country in furthering so worthy a cause.

Very sincerely yours,

MISS MARIE T. LOCKWOOD,
Supervisor of Public Health Nurses and Midwives.

SUMMARY OF WORK IN DELAWARE

Administrative agency: State health and welfare commission.

Staff: Director (nurse, part time), 13 community nurses (part time), 2 clerks (part time), 1 milk inspector (part time), 1 sanitary engineer (part time).

Activities: Child-health conferences, 797, at which 21,028 examinations were made. Continued corrections were obtained in every locality. The interest and cooperation of parents are increasing.

Prenatal conferences, 93. The number of women attending was not recorded.

Midwives' classes: Eleven class groups with an enrollment of 392. Two state-wide meetings attended by 182 midwives were held. Improvement in reporting births has been noted, also in the midwives' standards of personal hygiene and their use of equipped bags. Many who were inefficient have ceased to practice. Mothers' classes, 5, with 20 women attending.

Nutrition classes, 1.

Community demonstrations, 2.

A better milk supply was made the object of some campaign work. New permanent child-health centers established, 4. The centers have weekly conferences in rural districts and daily ones in city locations.

Volunteer assistance was given during the year by 3 physicians and approximately 30 lay workers.

Lectures and addresses by staff members, 90.

Exhibits: Graphs, charts, and exhibit material have been prepared for use at clubs and fairs, and films have been shown frequently.

Literature distributed: Several hundred Federal bulletins have been used each month, and a State health bulletin was printed and widely used.

FLORIDA

STATE BOARD OF HEALTH,
BUREAU OF CHILD WELFARE AND PUBLIC HEALTH NURSING,
Jacksonville, April 7, 1926.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,
*United States Senator,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.*

Sir: Replying to your letter of March 25, re: Sheppard-Towner work in Florida.

July 1, 1922, this work was begun with an appropriation of $3,000 Federal money matched by Florida Legislature with $3,000 State money. Four nurses (three white and one colored) were employed, and a state-wide program was planned and put in operation.

1923: Legislature in regular session matched the entire Sheppard-Towner appropriation for the State, which is $11,531.72.

1924: As a result of work accomplished by division of maternal and infant-hygiene staff, five extra nurses were added to the staff to work with school children.

1925: Two field supervisors were added, these to assist the director in giving an advisory and supervisory service to the rapidly increasing number of public-health nurses employed by organizations, industries, communities and counties, our desire being that no matter what the plan of work undertaken a program of Sheppard-Towner work should be carried on also.

1922: There were 16 nurses employed by counties, communities, and industries in the entire State.

1926: There are now 108; and while we can not claim that this increase is all due to the Sheppard-Towner work inaugurated in 1922, a large part of the increased interest and desire for continuous work in their respective counties has been due to the work done by the Sheppard-Towner nurses on their periodic visits.

Inclosed please find reports covering the work in Florida from its inception in 1922 to December 31, 1925. I am having some letters written you directly by people who have followed the work and can speak with authority about its value.

Assuring you, sir, of my appreciation of your interest, I am,

Respectfully,

LAURIE JEAN REID, R. N.,
Director Bureau of Child Welfare and Public Health Nursing.

Administrative agency: State board of health, bureau of child welfare and public-health nursing.

Staff: Director (nurse), 7 nurses (1 part time), 2 clerks (1 part time), 1 auditor (part time).

Activities: Child-health and prenatal conferences: One hundred and twenty-eight conferences for white children, with 2,326 examinations made; 48 for colored children, with 3,147 examinations made. At the conference 1,366 white mothers and 1,402 negroes were given instruction on prenatal care.

Midwives' classes: There were 134 class meetings for white midwives and 358 for colored. Altogether 2,902 midwives received instruction and 2,024 completed the prescribed course and received "certificates of fitness." Most of the undesirable midwives have ceased practicing. The follow-up work when a midwife reports stillbirths is having an excellent effect upon the work and the attitude of the midwives, and physicians are being more promptly called if abnormalities or unusual difficulties are to be dealt with.

Neighborhood institutes: In place of the usual mothers' classes it has been found advisable to hold a more informal kind of meeting, termed "neighborhood institutes," in order to obtain the desired attendance and arouse the interest of the women whom it is the aim to reach. Over 600 such meetings were held, more than half of them being for negroes:

The method of procedure was as follows:

The nurse who has to make a demonstration of maternity and infancy work first sought out a woman willing to offer her house for the occasion. The woman herself invited friends and neighbors, being left in control of the matter of whom might attend, unless she asked the nurse to extend invitations. The mothers were instructed in prenatal, postnatal, and child care. If possible more than one meeting of the same group is held. The nurse began her talk on preparation for confinement by telling the assembled women that she wished to help them to learn to improvise in order to save money. She showed them how to use material things at hand, even the contents of the rag-bag, in their preparation before the suggestion was made of expending a single penny. This proved more productive of results than permitting the nurse to carry with her an equipment whose very excellence discouraged mothers who could not afford one so complete.

During one month a different type of neighborhood institute from the one generally held was conducted in two counties. Several points in each county were covered, the same program being conducted in each place. In addition to the State nurse, who talked on maternal and infant hygiene, these institutes were attended by the county nurse, who talked on home hygiene and sanitation; the home demonstration agent, who talked on the family wardrobe; the county nutrition worker, who attended to the details of the noon meal during which the women were taught food values and proper menus for a well-balanced diet; and the county welfare worker who gave talks on household economics.

Dental clinics, 38, of which 9 were for negroes.

Demonstrations, 6: These were made in connection with local activities, such as well baby conferences, local fairs or celebrations, and the demonstrations covered feeding of infants, preparation and care of maternity cases, the use of silver nitrate in the eyes of the newborn, preparations of material to be used, such as solutions, pads, etc.

New permanent child-health centers established, 10.

Campaigns: During negro health week and the first week of May, a special campaign was carried on to interest parents in the periodic examination of infants and preschool children. Constant efforts have been made to improve birth registration, more than 1,000 unreported births being recorded and birth certificates issued.

Lectures and talks by staff members: 705, to both white and colored audiences in rural and urban localities. Films were shown by the movie truck in 49 rural districts before audiences totaling approximately 10,500 persons.

Literature distributed: About 10,700 copies, such as mothers' manuals, midwives' manuals, and bulletins on the feeding of children, and 7,430 pieces of miscellaneous material were distributed during the last half of the fiscal year. The number of the first half year was not reported.

Maternal and infant hygiene work is gradually being made a part of the work of the county and community nurses, and is regularly so done in 10 counties. The beginning was made by having them assist the State staff in conferences and in reporting conditions found.

GEORGIA

PROMOTION OF THE WELFARE AND HYGIENE OF MATERNITY AND INFANCY, STATE BOARD OF HEALTH AND UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF LABOR CHILDREN'S BUREAU, COOPERATING, STATE OF GEORGIA, Atlanta, Ga., March 2, 1926.

HON. MORRIS SHEPPARD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SHEPPARD: We would like for you to know what we think about the Federal aid given Georgia under the Sheppard-Towner Act. We think Congress should have expressions from the States as to what has been accomplished under the law. It is perfectly natural and commendable in our lawmaking bodies to take an inventory and find the results of appropriations made.

Immediately after the act was passed Georgia accepted it through Governor Hardwick. We immediately proceeded to get an organization for the purpose of carrying out the intent of the law. We had valuable advice and assistance from Washington, and a director for the work was loaned us for a short time.

I feel sure that every State has its own local problems, its own peculiar situation, its own most urgent need. Our State is about 80 per cent rural, with 161 counties and 3,000,000 people. We have a baby born in this State every seven minutes. We found that 11 of them died the first day; that one-third of all deaths in all ages were children under 15 years of age; that 10,215 were under 5 years, or 88 per cent of the total.

We found that of the 60,000 babies born each year 33,000 of them were born without a physician being present. We have about 5,000 negro midwives, many of them not able to read and write, firm believers in many superstitions, charms, etc. This we consider perhaps our greatest problem.

To do a good job the expectant mother had to be reached and educated, as well as the midwife. The unvarnished facts were laid before the State Medical Association, and the house of delegates passed a resolution asking us to take charge of the situation and prepare regulations for midwives and proceed to give them the necessary training. The regulations were prepared, as well as a set of 10 lessons, for midwives. These were submitted by the president of the medical association to the counselors by mail, and they were requested to vote "yea" or "nay." They passed the regulations. Therefore it will be seen that the regulation of midwives is a medical association act; we simply administer it for them.

To reach the rural mother (black and white), we put in the field the healthmobile manned (or rather womaned) by a woman physician, a nurse, and a director of visual education. The State supervisor of nurses is the advance agent, and goes into a county some two weeks in advance of the unit, makes all necessary arrangements and contacts, always getting the county medical society in line first, taking their advice, and next the superintendent of schools. This conference decides who will sponsor the work in the county, either the P. T. A., woman's club, or some other association of women. The program for each day is practically the same: Mothers' conference, examination of babies, midwives, expectant mothers, and each evening a public meeting, at which a talk is given on sanitation, health, and the necessity of the examination of expectant mothers and the supposedly healthy babies, the remainder of the evening being spent with the movies on health—the healthmobile being equipped with generator for lights and two picture machines.

We follow up our contacts with visits by nurses in the home. Everywhere we have been gladly received and have had many requests for return visits.

We now have 18 nurses on our staff. In addition to the county work, we instruct midwives, conduct mothers' classes and little mothers' leagues. The average county requires about six weeks for the itinerant nurse. The larger counties require her services continually, as we try to organize clinics for both the mothers and babies. Children's health centers are permanent organizations. We are endeavoring to have Georgia children physically fit when they enter school.

We manufacture and distribute to the physicians and midwives 1 per cent solution of silver nitrate for the prevention of blindness. It is a misdemeanor for one who attends a woman in labor not to put this solution in the baby's eyes. By the use of this we hope to reduce blindness 50 per cent in our State.

I might mention that in one instance the work of one of our negro nurses has reduced the negro mortality in her county among infants and young children 52 per cent, and that we employ three negro nurses, besides having been loaned the services of a negro woman physician.

I am requesting some of our people who are familiar with the work in Georgia to give you their opinion direct. I hope this will not burden you too much; I feel that this letter direct from the citizen to you is better than my editing their opinions and expressions. I am also taking the liberty of sending you under separate cover several annual reports of the State board of health, the statistics therein having been compiled by one from your own State—Dr. William A. Davis.

One of our greatest handicaps is the limited franking privilege.

Please request us for any information that we have not given or anything that we can do to secure the continuation of the Sheppard-Towner law. The value of the work in our State can not be placed in dollars and cents but in the lives of mothers and children and in the years to come a citizenship fit to labor and produce.

Yours very truly,

JOE P. BOWDOIN, M. D.,
Director, Division of Child Hygiene,
Special Agent, Children's Bureau.

HAWAII

BOARD OF HEALTH, TERRITORY OF HAWAII,
Honolulu, March 12, 1926.

HON. MORRIS SHEPPARD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SHEPPARD: As one of the originators of the Sheppard-Towner maternity and infancy act, you would be interested to know what this appropriation means to mothers and little children of many races here in Hawaii. The Territory has had the benefit of this Federal assistance only since last summer, but the remarkable rapidity with which the work has progressed in so short a time indicates the need it has met and the appreciation with which it is received.

In seven months 51 health centers have been established in the rural districts of Hawaii. More than 2,000 children are already enrolled in these health centers with a monthly attendance of about 1,500. This rapid progress is the result of the cordial cooperation which we have received everywhere. Plantation managers welcome our work and cooperate because they know it to be sound from a business standpoint. Sick babies mean laborers away from work. Physicians are generously giving their time to take part in the work. In rural Hawaii physicians are responsible for districts with enormous population, so they realize the value of preventive as well as curative medicine.

To our health centers come babies and mothers of every race. Interpreters are necessary in many cases, but a desire to give the best care to little children seems to speak a universal language.

In the beginning people asked me how we should get them to come, but one of my nurses said to me recently, "Soon we will have to ask you how to keep them from coming; if the numbers continue to increase as they have done it will be difficult to be as thorough as you insist we must be to be effective."

Yours very truly,

V. B. APPLETON, M. D., Director.

IDAHO

STATE OF IDAHO, DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WELFARE, BUREAU OF CHILD HYGIENE,
Boise, Idaho, March 13, 1926.

HON. MORRIS SHEPPARD,
Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We have your letter relative to the activities of the Sheppard-Towner work in Idaho. As I have been connected with the work since its beginning in the State your letter has been referred to me,

Prior to the enactment of this law the Bureau of Child Hygiene had never received any money from the State. It was a department in name only. The last two legislatures have each appropriated $5,000 for this bureau. While this amount is small compared to what some of the States are appropriating, we feel that it is a beginning of the State's realization of its duty to the mothers and children within its borders.

I am inclosing herewith a brief statement of our work and extracts from some of the letters received.

Wishing you the best of success in a work which has meant so much to the mothers and babies of our Nation, I am,

Most respectfully,

Mrs. S. J. EWEN,
Associate Director Bureau Child Hygiene.

SUMMARY OF THE MATERNITY AND INFANCY WORK IN IDAHO

In Idaho the Sheppard-Towner funds are administered through the bureau of child hygiene. The program of the bureau is planned with the thought of reaching the mothers who live in the isolated rural communities, mothers who by reason of their isolation have not had the opportunity to learn that the right kind of prenatal and postnatal care will not only conserve the health of mothers and babies but in many instances the lives.

The outstanding feature of the program is the mother and child health conferences, the greater number of which have been held in the rural communities. At these conferences mothers are given simple but scientific instruction in the care, feeding, and general development of their children and the hygiene of maternity. That mothers appreciate this opportunity that the State gives them is evidenced by the fact that at the 65 conferences held, 633 mothers and 5,714 children have been examined.

Follow-up visits on the cases examined show that many children have been brought back to normal health by the correction of defects and a better knowledge on the part of the mother regarding care and feeding.

Some striking results of the examinations of the mothers have been obtained, including the discovery of cancer in its early stages in six of the mothers. The subsequent removal of these growths, thereby preventing long illnesses and possibly the deaths of these mothers, is a result of the work which should commend itself to any thinking person.

Actual results of the Idaho program may be summed up as follows:

1. The maternity death rate is steadily decreasing.
2. The 1925 infant mortality rate is the lowest that Idaho has ever had.
3. Physicians report that more women are consulting them during the early months of pregnancy than heretofore.
4. Mothers report better babies and fewer sick babies.

INDIANA

INDIANA STATE BOARD OF HEALTH,
UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF LABOR, CHILDREN'S BUREAU,
Indianapolis, March 29, 1926.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SHEPPARD: I am very much interested in your letter of March 25. For some reason we did not receive in this department an earlier letter from you.

I am inclosing a letter which was made a part of the record on the hearing before the House committee and the summary, which was also included.

Recently I wrote for our State health bulletin a narrative summary of the work in Indiana before and after the acceptance of the Sheppard-Towner Act. I prepared for the League of Women Voters a similar article, all of which I am sending you. As soon as the 1925 report comes from the press I shall send you a copy of that.

If you need additional material, I shall be glad to supply it.

Very respectfully yours, *

ADA E. SCHWEITZER, M. D.,
Director of Division of Infant and Child Hygiene.

INDIANA STATE BOARD OF HEALTH,
DIVISION OF INFANT AND CHILD HYGIENE AND UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
CHILDREN'S BUREAU, INDIANAPOLIS.

Miss GRACE ABBOTT,

Chief U. S. Department of Labor,
Children's Bureau, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MISS ABBOTT: I believe that the extension of the act for protection of maternity and infancy (Sheppard-Towner Act) should be for at least another five-year period for the following reasons:

1. Initiation of maternity and infancy activities in many States and the extension of programs in others were made possible by the Federal aid.
2. Much has been accomplished in improving infant health and in lowering infant mortality rates, for ages 1 month to 1 year. This work needs further stabilizing and localizing.

3. Much more needs to be done in lowering early infant mortality and maternal mortality, and in securing observance of better health standards at all ages.

4. The mutual helpfulness of States to each other, the promotion of effective activities on a more economic basis has been greatly enhanced by the helpfulness of the Federal board in evaluating activities and in acting as a clearing house for new ideas and plans of work.

5. Our plan of work has been accepted by them. Improvements suggested and much valuable additional assistance has been given, through speakers, correspondence, quotas of bureau publications, and loans of equipment.

The Indiana State health commissioner, Dr. Wm. F. King, authorizes the statement that the Association of State and Provincial Health Officers approve the extension for a period not less than 10 years.

Respectfully,

ADA E. SCHWEITZER, M. D.

Administrative agency: State board of health, division of infant and child hygiene. Staff: Director (physician), 3 physicians, 4 nurses, 1 exhibit director, 1 clerk and organizer, 1 secretary, 4 clerks.

Activities: Child-health conferences, 119, at which 3,937 children were examined. A special survey was made in two counties (La Porte and Newton) to discover the situation in regard to correction of defects which had been noted by physicians examining in conferences. The percentage 36.89 was ascertained for La Porte County. For Newton 48.4 per cent. Much general improvement was noted in health and habits.

Mothers' classes, 374, with 16,640 women enrolled, has been the major feature of the program in Indiana for the entire year. Three units are in the field conducting the classes, each unit consisting of a doctor and a nurse. The class work is given in five lessons, three by a physician and two demonstrations by the nurse. The emphasis is placed on prenatal care and preparation for home confinement, though one lesson is devoted to the care of the baby in its first year and one lesson to the preschool child. With this plan Indiana is working out a prenatal program, with much attention to detail by educational methods.

Usually a circuit includes two counties, with lessons in each a week apart to each group in the circuit. The work is arranged to take in all sections of the county, 8 to 14 classes in each. The nurse usually gives demonstrations before class groups in one county, while the doctor lectures before the groups in an adjoining county. Each is equipped with a car and material for illustrating her share of the work. Motion pictures are a feature of the work. While the physician gives the last lecture of the series, the nurse enters the next community to arouse interest in the classes. Letters with a questionnaire are also sent to the secretary of the county medical society, the county health officer, and the local physicians. Newspaper publicity is obtained, and mimeographed outlines of the lectures distributed. Women who are prominent in organization work are asked to serve as county and township chairman. An attempt is usually made to have a continuation of the course conducted by local physicians.

Lectures and talks by staff members, 1,980. Motion pictures were widely shown, and a number of charts were also loaned for exhibit purposes at county fairs and on other occasions.

Exhibits and projects: Child-health week at Winona Lake, Chautauqua, Indiana State fair better baby contest, lectures on care of the baby and motherhood to girls at Home Economics School, model maternity and infancy center in new baby building at State fair, exhibits shown at county fairs and other meetings, exhibit prepared for American Medical Association meeting in Chicago shown at State conference of charities and corrections, also at Illinois League of Women Voters meeting in Chicago. Other exhibits were shown at Peoria, Ill.; Lafayette, Ind.; Biennial Council of the General Federation of Women's Clubs, West Baden, Ind.; National Educational Association at Indianapolis, and exhibits were also shown before local, State, and national groups, all of which has aided the national program for maternity and infancy work.

Literature distributed, 156,044 pamphlets, etc.

Midwives: There are fewer than 200 in the State, and these are mostly in two districts whose population is largely foreign. The women are learning that they should demand skilled attention.

Volunteer assistance was given by 44 physicians, 19 nurses, and more than 500 lay persons. Efficient cooperation has been given by nearly every state-wide women's organization, including parent-teacher associations, and a number of men's fraternal and professional organizations.

THE STATE UNIVERSITY OF IOWA,
DIVISION OF MATERNITY AND INFANT HYGIENE,
Iowa City, Iowa, February 27, 1926.

MORRIS SHEPPARD,

United States Senator,
Senate Offices, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SHEPPARD: As an immediate reply to your letter regarding the Sheppard-Towner work I am sending a copy of a bulletin which explains the nature of the work. Although this is now old, a second edition is being prepared bringing the figures up to date. The general nature of the work is about the same.

I should be glad to learn what other specific information you would like, and should be glad to send you anything I can get.

Assuring you of my desire to be at your service, I remain,

Yours very truly,

EDWARD H. LAUER, Director.

EXCERPTS FROM BULLETIN ON MATERNITY WORK IN IOWA

A casual wayfarer driving past the consolidated school at the edge of the little town is attracted by the jam of autos and the groups of people in the school yard. It is midsummer. School is not in session and so he stops to see what is going on. Inside the building a waiting room is crowded with mothers and children. A swinging door gives a glimpse of a physician examining a rosy cherub proudly held in his mother's arms while a nurse fills out the health chart. Another door opens and a mother, or perhaps a mother and father, are ushered out from a private conference with a second physician—a woman—who excuses herself with the remark that at 3 she is to talk to a group of mothers on prenatal care. Here another group is poring over the pamphlets on infant feeding or child care or the nurse may be showing them the latest styles in sensible baby wear. To the interested query as to the meaning of all this, one of the busy farmer's wives in charge says, "Why, we are having a Sheppard-Towner clinic," and she hurries away to see if the doctor will have time to see just one more baby.

PRINCIPLES UNDERLYING THE PROGRAM

In setting up the program for Iowa the following fundamental principles were considered operative, and no activity was undertaken which could not be justified by its relation to these principles.

1. Federal and State grants always have as their primary objective the stimulation of local communities to learn how to do certain things which need to be done, and then by virtue of this knowledge to encourage these communities to make provision for doing these things without Federal or State aid.

2. The program therefore must be essentially educational.

3. The particular objective in this field is to awaken people to an appreciation of the importance of the public-health problem and then to stimulate communities to organize their resources to meet that problem.

4. Absolutely basic to the success of any public-health program is the situation in which adequate medical and dental service of the highest type shall be within reach of every person.

5. To render such trained medical and dental service effective, however, it is necessary that the general public shall be educated to make use of such service to the fullest extent. The individual must be brought to see that he owes it to society to be healthy.

THE IOWA PROGRAM

The activities carried on by the division of maternity and infant hygiene in accordance with the above fundamental principles have been as follows:

1. The holding of clinics or conferences at which children of pre-school age have been examined. Special effort has been made to reach children in need of medical attention. The service is limited to diagnosis, and for treatment of defects parents are referred in every case to their family physician.

2. In connection with these clinics group meetings and individual conferences on prenatal care have been held by women physicians with mothers and expectant mothers.

3. Literature on infant feeding, infant care, child care, prenatal care, children's teeth, etc., has been prepared and distributed throughout the State.

4. There has been inaugurated a program of active cooperation with the State Medical and State Dental Societies, primarily through their respective committees, in an attempt to make available to the general practitioner the best technique and latest advances in the fields of obstetrics, pediatrics, and oral hygiene.

WHAT HAS BEEN DONE WITH CHILDREN

Up to July 1, 1924, clinics have been held in 540 communities in 97 of the 99 counties of the State, with a total of 696 days of service. The following map and tables show in detail the work done:

THE FUTURE

The work has begun well and has been successful in arousing interest and enthusiasm throughout the State. If the activity can be continued for a number of years along the lines laid down, the results will fulfill the expectations of the supporters of the program.

KENTUCKY

STATE BOARD OF HEALTH OF KENTUCKY,
BUREAU OF MATERNAL AND CHILD HEALTH,
Louisville, Ky., March 6, 1926.

HON. MORRIS SHEPPARD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have received your letter of February 23, and have been trying to get together letters which I thought might be useful to you in your work toward the continuance of the Sheppard-Towner Act.

I am inclosing an outline of the plan of our work in Kentucky which we have been carrying on since we first received national funds. This plan of work was approved by all organizations in the State and by the medical profession. So far as I know, in Kentucky we have had no opposition to the work from any part of the public or from the medical profession.

Since July, 1922, we have done a great deal of health educational work before many groups consisting of men's and women's organizations and before large numbers of school children. Each year we have had some one on the program of the State medical society. We also have had opportunity of speaking to many county medical societies on maternal and child health.

Much has been said by those opposed to it about Sheppard-Towner work not lowering maternal and infant death rates. This has not been true in our own State. Nevertheless, so many factors affect the statistics of both birth and death rates that I hardly think it fair in so short a period of time to expect definite results in any State concerning these rates, but I do know what we have done is to improve the standard of health for women and children and also the care they are now receiving. Naturally, lower death rates are bound to be a by-product of our work.

I wish I could express to you the appreciation of all the women of my State for the stand some of the splendid men in Washington are taking by being interested in the human needs of the people whom you represent.

Feeling sure you will have success in the effort you are making, and with kindest regards, I am,

Faithfully yours,

ANNIE S. VEECH, M. D.

P. S.: Inclosed you will find figures for the work accomplished since 1922. During 1925 the department has done a definite piece of maternal and child-health work in 110 of the 120 counties in Kentucky. By this you see the increase in what we have been able to do from year to year.

I am inclosing a selected number of letters, many of which have come to us unsolicited from the people in the State.

A. S. V.

LOUISIANA

STATE OF LOUISIANA, DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH,
New Orleans, March 3, 1926.

HON. MORRIS SHEPPARD,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SHEPPARD: As coauthor of the Sheppard-Towner maternity act, I feel sure you will be interested in our work in Louisiana.

We did not begin until September 1, 1924, because the legislature up to that time had not seen fit to accept the terms of the Sheppard-Towner Act and only did so at the 1924 meeting because Doctor Dowling, of the State board of health, offered to meet the Federal appropriation out of the appropriation given the State board of health for general work.

Naturally through the bureau of child hygiene we had done some infancy and maternity work, but very little because of lack of funds.

I have tabulated reports of work from September, 1924, to December, 1925, and take pleasure in inclosing a copy of the tabulation. I think it speaks for itself, as work of this character with so many children in such a large number of the parishes of the State and in different lines must bring great returns, although we can not know of the effect in so short a time as a year and a few months.

As requested, I am inclosing copies of letters in regard to the work.

Very truly yours,

AGNES MORRIS, Director.

MARYLAND

STATE OF MARYLAND DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH,
Baltimore, February 26, 1926.

Senator MORRIS SHEPPARD,

Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR SHEPPARD: Replying to your letter of the 23d asking what has been accomplished by the bureau of child hygiene in Maryland, I think I can best reply by sending you a copy of the "Activities of the Bureau of Child Hygiene," also a copy of a letter received some time ago from a grateful lady on the Eastern Shore. This came as a surprise, without solicitation.

The bureau of maternity and child hygiene was established in Maryland to take advantage of the provisions of the Sheppard-Towner bill. Up to that time there was no bureau covering this field in our department.

It is only fair to say that in the administration of the bureau we have been perfectly free to develop our own program and carry out our work as we have seen fit. We have attempted no spectacular activities, but have devoted the resources of the bureau to building up public-health sentiment and activities for children in the various counties; that is, in helping each county help its own children. This year, for the first time, each of the counties has one or more public-health nurses. In 15 counties the bureau is contributing toward the budget of the nurses. All the nurses are carrying on child-health work.

Believe me, very truly yours,

J. H. M. KNOX, Jr.,
Chief, Bureau of Child Hygiene.

SUMMARY OF THE WORK IN MARYLAND

ACTIVITIES OF THE BUREAU OF CHILD HYGIENE

The bureau of child hygiene of the Maryland State department of health is the youngest of the eight bureaus of the department. It was established in 1922, and is financed partly by State and partly by Federal funds (Sheppard-Towner appropriation). Its activities are limited, in accordance with the laws under which it operates, to advisory care of mothers and children under school age. Care of the health of children of school age, with special reference to the control of communicable diseases, and the medical inspection of school children in the grades is included among the activities of the State bureau of communicable diseases.

MIDWIFERY SURVEY

The first piece of work undertaken by the bureau after its organization was a survey of the midwifery conditions in the State.

FIELD WORK

The field work of the bureau is done in cooperation with the deputy State health officer or local health officer with the assistance of the local public-health nurse. Clinic physicians are sent on invitation from the deputy State health officer or local health officer to conduct the child-health conferences that have been organized in 15 of the 23 counties.

CHILD-HEALTH CONFERENCES

These conferences are held at regular intervals, usually about once a month, in different parts of the county. No medical treatments are given, but any child who needs such treatment is referred to its family physician. Great care is taken to interest and secure the cooperation of the local physician. A report is sent to each physician outlining the results of the examination of his patient.

Nearly 5,000 babies and preschool children (4,986) were examined at the 279 conferences that were held during the year ending December 31, 1925.

PRENATAL ADVICE

Regular prenatal conferences have not been organized. Whenever advice is given, it is given in response to the request of the mother. A circular entitled "Suggestions to Maryland's Future Mothers," containing advice in regard to care during the prenatal period, was published during the summer of 1925. Copies of the circular were sent to all the physicians in the counties, for use in their private practice, and to the public-health nurses.

EARLY VISITS WHERE THERE ARE NEWBORN BABIES

In a number of the counties a special effort is made by the public-health nurses to visit each new mother as soon as possible after the birth of the baby, in order that the mother may have the benefit of helpful suggestions. In accordance with this plan the registrars in 15 counties send an early report of births to the deputy State health officer, and through him to the public-health nurse. The counties in which this is done are Allegany, Anne Arundel, Calvert, Cecil, Charles, Frederick, Harford, Kent, Montgomery, Prince Georges, Somerset, St. Marys, Talbot, Wicomico, and Worcester.

EDUCATIONAL MATERIAL

Educational literature on the care of the baby and the preschool child is distributed by the bureau and is available to any nurse or mother in the county who desires it. The bureau recently issued a pamphlet of instructions to be used in classes for midwives.

STATEMENT BY MARYLAND MOTHER

MAY 30, 1925.

There are some privileges extended to the public which are loudly lauded, while other most important opportunities are accorded us and probably we fail to adequately express our delight and appreciation for services rendered. It is in this spirit of thanksgiving that I tender these few lines.

I am one of the Talbot County mothers who has enjoyed and profited by the medical advice of some of the most prominent and ablest physicians in Maryland. This great service has been procured through the bureau of child hygiene, conducted monthly in our county by Dr. J. H. Mason Knox, Jr., chief.

It is surprising, however, how few mothers, comparatively speaking, have seized this opportunity of placing the supposedly well children under such physical inspection. At the monthly conferences the preschool child—infancy to seven years, inclusive—is given a thorough examination, the individual history recorded, each defect registered and then referred to the family physician for any necessary treatment. Personally I deem it one of the greatest assets that young mothers possess—access to such superior knowledge for the mere asking—and am very proud that my native State takes advantage of this phase of the Sheppard-Towner bill in appropriating a sum of money to carry on such a magnificent work. Its advantages must be even keener in the rural sections, where local physicians are fewer and beyond the "beck-and-call" range.

This article has been prompted by the heartfelt whisperings of mothers overheard by the writer at a recent conference, grateful mothers who desire other parents to profit by their good fortune. Our sincerest appreciation is directed to our two Talbot County health nurses and to the various specialists who so arrange their professional hours to help keep well our little folks—to-morrow's healthful men and women.

MINNESOTA

MINNESOTA DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH,
DIVISION OF CHILD HYGIENE,
Minneapolis, Minn., March 2, 1926.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,
United States Senate,
Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SHEPPARD: I am inclosing a copy of a brief summary of the educational program in maternal and infant hygiene that has been carried on in Minnesota under the Sheppard-Towner Act. I believe this will give you in as concrete a form as possible an idea of the type of program which has been carried on in Minnesota.

As you request, I am also inclosing copies of a few letters received from women in the State typical of the response which comes from women who have received aid through this act.

If you wish any further information about our work here, I shall be very pleased to send it to you.

Respectfully yours,

Director.

EXCERPTS FROM MINNESOTA PROGRAM

The division of child hygiene of the Minnesota State Board of Health was formed July 1, 1922, to administer the Sheppard-Towner Act in Minnesota. The formation of this division of the State board of health was necessitated by the passage of the Federal Sheppard-Towner law and the acceptance of the provisions of this act by our State legislature. The duties of the division of child hygiene are to cooperate with the United States Children's Bureau in the promotion of the welfare and hygiene of maternity and infancy. The State law authorized the State board of health "to provide instruction and advice to expectant mothers during pregnancy and confinement and to mothers after childbirth." By the wording of the Federal and State laws the activities of the division are necessarily limited to educational work.

Prenatal letters: A series of nine prenatal letters containing advice and instruction for expectant mothers has been prepared. The names of the women to whom these letters are sent are referred to us by physicians and public-health nurses, as well as by the women or their friends. The fact that many physicians of the State are using these letters for all of their expectant mothers shows that they fill a real need. During the year 1923 about 2,000 women received these letters.

Prenatal clinics: During the past year monthly prenatal clinics have been held in five counties of the State in cooperation with the physicians in the counties. The purpose of the clinics is to cooperate with the physicians in the promotion of the well-being of expectant mothers and to impress upon the women of the community the necessity for going to their doctors for prenatal care. Before starting clinics in any county a meeting was held with the physicians discussing the plans for clinics with them. At these clinics a complete physical examination was given each woman. A general talk on the hygiene of maternity is given by the clinician, and a nurse from the division demonstrates the preparation for home confinement. Such men as Dr. Fred L. Adair and Dr. C. O. Maland have been the clinicians at these clinics.

MISSISSIPPI

MISSISSIPPI STATE BOARD OF HEALTH,
Jackson, Miss., February 16, 1926.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR SHEPPARD: In reply to your letter of February 23, under separate cover, we are mailing to you our biennial report to the legislature and your attention is called to pages 214 to 285, inclusive. This will acquaint you with the maternal and infant hygiene activities in the State.

Personally, and as executive officer of the State board of health, I wish to express my appreciation of the splendid aid that has been extended to us under the Sheppard-Towner Maternity Act.

It is rather encouraging to go out in the field and find professional and lay members of the community speaking of "prenatal care," "mothers' classes," "child welfare conferences," and the like. A few years ago the communities were interested in school work only, but more and more are realizing these newer phases of the work.

I trust you may glean some of the information you desire from our report. With best wishes, I am,

Yours very truly,

F. J. UNDERWOOD, M. D.,
Executive Officer Mississippi State Board of Health.

SUMMARY OF WORK IN MISSOURI UNDER MATERNITY ACT

Administrative agency: State board of health, division of child hygiene.

Staff: Director (physician), 1 physician, 2 staff nurses, 3 county nurses, 1 nutrition worker, 3 clerks. Additional medical and nursing assistants for special work as needed.

Activities: Child-health conferences, 146, at which 4,161 examinations were made. The correction of defects which had been noted at conferences averaged 17 per cent. In some communities the percentage ran as high as 30 per cent.

Prenatal conferences, 90, with an attendance of 2,298.

Mothers' classes, 195 class groups, with 3,157 women enrolled. One of the most important phases of the work of the county maternity and infancy nurses has been the mothers' classes. The course includes 10 lessons outlined by the State division. It is given to any group of women in the county who request it. When the course is completed an infant clinic is usually held.

Little mothers' classes, 95. In some communities this has been a vacation activity for schoolgirls, but a number of junior high schools have made the work a compulsory course.

Dental clinics, 5, with 258 children receiving care.

Nutrition classes, 90. These are conducted by the State nutrition worker and arranged on a county basis. The counties selected are allotted a period of one month's time each for the work. Prior to the nutrition worker's arrival in the county, the county health department arranges for group meetings for mothers in at least six different communities of the county. In this manner a series of four lessons can be given to each group. The subjects discussed with the mothers are as follows: (1) Food selection; (2) food habit; (3) scoring lessons on usual diet; (4) proper diet for the expectant mothers; (5) diet in overweight and underweight and in constipation.

Group demonstrations: Fifty-one conducted at county fairs, community home-comings, farm picnics, etc. Demonstrations include such things as preparation of artificial feeding, nursing care, and preparation for home confinement. Sometimes talks on child care are given and educational films and slides are shown.

Home demonstrations, 3,633. These demonstrations are given by the county nurses in the homes. They include the following: Preparation of a feeding formula; home pasteurization of milk; care of the new-born baby; post partum care; preparation of infant layette and preparation of a sterile obstetrical pack for home delivery. In many instances there are many other problems which the mothers desire to take up with the nurse, and these problems are handled according to the particular question involved.

A birth-registration campaign was made the feature of the observance of child-health day on May day. A chairman of May day activities was appointed by the State board of health, and an executive committee, consisting of the county superintendent of schools, county health officer, and president of the county medical society was organized in each county. The committee enlisted the cooperation of any and all interested organizations in the county. Each county worked through its school districts, and a complete survey was made of every birth in that district during the year of 1924 on forms furnished by the State board of health. When the survey was completed all forms were returned to the bureau of vital statistics and the names were checked against the records on file. If the bureau of vital statistics found a birth not registered, a letter was sent to the physician or midwife delivering the case requesting that the birth be properly registered as soon as possible. Through this campaign much interest has been aroused in birth registration, and it is believed that when the next Federal check is made the State will be admitted to the birth-registration area.

New, permanent child-health centers established, 6.

Lectures and talks by staff members, 190.

Literature distributed, 116,546 pamphlets, leaflets, etc.

Prenatal letters: Six thousand one hundred and twenty-six distributed.

Exhibit material: Five health films were loaned to 25 communities.

A sterile obstetrical pack was also made, with mimeographed instructions for its preparation.

An intensive six-month's campaign for diphtheria immunization was conducted, in which 3,397 children were treated, and local physicians aided by giving talks on the prevention of diphtheria, and two films on the subject were loaned to communities requesting them.

The stimulation of interest due to the work of the division resulted in four counties raising funds for the employment of county nurses and in the passage of a law at the last session of the legislature giving county courts authority to appropriate money for public-health nursing work.

MONTANA

MONTANA STATE BOARD OF HEALTH,
DIVISION OF CHILD WELFARE,
Helena, March 1, 1926.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,

United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR SHEPPARD: Thank you very much for your letter of February 23, expressing your interest in the future of the Sheppard-Towner maternity act. I am inclosing for your use a copy of a paper which summarizes Sheppard-Towner activities in Montana from July 1, 1922, to June 30, 1925. In addition to what is stated in this paper, I should like to say that since June 30, 1925, we have also aided in county nursing services for the following counties: Prairie and McCone combined and Broadwater, Meagher, and Wheatland combined. In addition, during the last half of 1925, we held approximately 270 baby and preschool child conferences with 3,000 children examined. About 1,624 ampoules of silver nitrate were distributed, and over 30,000 pamphlets, cards, and leaflets on maternity and infancy welfare were distributed.

Montana first accepted the act through its governor in 1922, and in the following year the State legislature accepted the act and appropriated the full amount necessary to meet the entire Sheppard-Towner Federal appropriation, $8,701.91. The next legislature of January, 1925, appropriated $8,700 to meet the Sheppard-Towner Act. I think that this will show you the way Montana feels about this maternity and infancy act, and that the people of the State are as a whole deeply interested in its success. * * *

Thanking you for your interest, I am,

Yours very truly,

HAZEL DELL BONNESS, M. D., Director.

DESCRIPTION OF WORK UNDER MATERNITY ACT IN MONTANA

The work in Montana was begun in May, 1922. The first year was spent largely in acquainting the people of the State with the nature of the work and in making a beginning in our program. Since that time the program has developed rapidly until at the present time we have several well-defined objectives. At the outset it was admitted that we could not get very far with our maternity and infancy program without proper vital statistics as upon satisfactory registration depends our accurate knowledge of mortality rates. We have made it a part of our program to aid in every way possible the registration of births and deaths in Montana. Secondly, we have felt that it is impossible to do any sort of permanent work in the maternity and infancy field without county public-health nurses. To this end we have aided in the establishment of county nursing services wherever possible. The third feature of our work has been an intensive campaign of educational health conferences carried on through our field staff and of educational propaganda through our office.

Our State field staff at the present time consists of four nurses. This staff is maintained in cooperation with the Montana Tuberculosis Association, and one field nurse is maintained by the tuberculosis association and three by the board of health. Our nurses hold baby and prenatal conferences and give lectures and demonstrations. In addition to our State field staff, we are carrying on the policy of aiding in county nursing services.

The following counties have received aid in their nursing services to the extent of one-fourth of the nurse's salary during the year:

Daniels County, one year.
Pondera, one year.
Beaverhead, one year.
Fergus, one year.
Wibaux, one year.
Fallon, one year.
Prairie, one year.
Cascade, one year.
Lewis and Clark, three years.
Missoula, three years.
Dawson, one year.
Gallatin, one year.
Powell, one year.
Flathead, one year.

It is not possible to convey to you an adequate idea of the amount of work that is carried on in Montana under the provisions of the Sheppard-Towner Act without giving some figures. From the beginning of our active field work in the autumn of 1922 to June, 1925, the following work has been done:

Baby and prenatal conferences	1,639
Children examined	20,996
Prenatal cases personally advised	1,669
Prenatal cases which have received our sets of 9 letters	1,500
Mothers advised at clinics, mothers' classes, etc.	10,822
Little mothers' classes held with an average of 10; 12 lessons given to each class	59
Baby birth registration cards	30,000
Ampoules of silver nitrate distributed	6,686
Laboratory examinations (maternity and infancy only)	4,620
Literature distributed through our office, including diet cards, height and weight cards, pamphlets on prenatal, infant, and child care, etc.	60,000

It is very difficult to evaluate the results of our educational program, as we have no exact scientific measure of the accomplishments. We have ample indirect evidence of the good resulting from the work in the increased interest in maternity and infant hygiene shown all over the State. We have considerable correspondence in our office concerning these matters with women who have become especially interested. Our nurses report that the work is being more and more favorably received, and, best of all, we know that the children who are being seen for the second, third, or fourth time are showing marked improvement in health and parents are having defects corrected in a most gratifying manner.

While we can not draw any very definite conclusions concerning our maternity and infancy mortality rates because of the short time the Sheppard-Towner work has been under way, yet I think that we may say that we have already been able to lend some influence to the favorable trend of these rates in Montana:

Maternal mortality		Infant mortality
1915	8.2	1915	73.3
1916	9.5	1916	85.4
1917	12.3	1917	94.0
1918	15.6	1918	87.0
1919	11.7	1919	80.0
1920	8.7	1920	72.7
1921	7.4	1921	67.0
1922	7.8	1922	68.7
1923	7.5	1923	71.4
1924 (provisional figures)	7.1	1924	65.6

NEBRASKA

STATE OF NEBRASKA,
Lincoln, March 2, 1926.

Mr. MORRIS SHEPPARD,

Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SHEPPARD: It gives me pleasure to comply with your request of February 23.

Nebraska had no work in maternity, infancy, or child hygiene until the maternity and infancy act was accepted by our legislature in 1922. This division of child hygiene, in the State bureau of health, was created then to administer the funds in educational work for the health of mothers and little children in Nebraska. During these years past there have been many thousands of children examined by our competent local physicians, and fathers and mothers have been instructed in the care of the child, and many physical defects found have been corrected. "Follow-up" home calls are made by the field nurse to further instruct and guide these parents in the better health of mothers and children. This work is highly appreciated, and often expectant mothers are found in these homes who need instruction and encouragement.

The prenatal instruction to expectant mothers has been much appreciated, as the accompanying letters show.

Mothercraft classes have been held in various parts of the State, in which prenatal care and care at confinement has been stressed, as well as the physical care of the body.

The bulletins Prenatal Care, Infant Care, Child Care, and Child Management have been distributed in large numbers—during 1924, 73,188, and 1925 (one-half year), 19,246.

A trained Indian nurse has done splendid educational work with the Indian mothers and little children. More mothers are coming to the agency hospital and doctor for care than ever before, and better conditions in the homes prevail.

Very truly yours,

LOUISE M. MURPHY, R. N.,
Director, Division Child Hygiene.

NEVADA

NEVADA STATE BOARD OF HEALTH, CHILD WELFARE DIVISION AND UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF LABOR AND CHILDREN'S BUREAU COOPERATING,

March 10, 1926.

MORRIS SHEPPARD,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SHEPPARD: Am inclosing our first biennial report. We have continued along the same lines as originally planned, and at present have seven public-health nurses in the State.

There are 17 counties in Nevada, and we have divided the State into eight districts; up to date we have given some service to every county but one and will have a nurse in there for demonstration work within the next few weeks. You can readily see that this service is limited in some of the districts as it is impossible for the nurses to reach every place; distances are great, as well as the country sparsely settled. Dr. Russell Anderson, of the Children's Bureau, in Washington, has a copy of a letter written by one of our nurses that will give you an idea of our difficulties; she tells me that she does not know of a case parallel to this one in any other State. I am sure that she will be glad to let you have a copy of this if you wish it.

The nurses without doubt have been able to get closer to the people and have had better personal contact by being forced to make the home calls and give advice there.

This has gone a long way toward educating the public; it seems necessary to educate each individual to sell the maternity and infancy program to the masses.

Am inclosing a copy of the work done from September, 1925, to January, 1926.

At present we are starting an intensive piece of work among the preschool children of the State that will enter school in September, 1926.

The parents seem most interested in this piece of work.

Our plans are to have the first examinations in March and April and, if possible, another in August, before school starts; if this can not be done in August, we will have a second examination as soon after school opens as convenient.

We are following along the line used by Dr. Ellen Stadtmuller, of California, during the time that she did the preschool work there last year, but in a much smaller way.

Sincerely yours,

MAUDE WHEELER,
Executive Secretary Child Welfare Division.

NEW HAMPSHIRE

NEW HAMPSHIRE STATE BOARD OF HEALTH,
DIVISION OF MATERNITY, INFANCY, AND CHILD HYGIENE,
CHILDREN'S BUREAU COOPERATING,

Concord, March 8, 1926.

MORRIS SHEPPARD,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR SHEPPARD: The maternity and infancy work brought about through the Sheppard-Towner Act in New Hampshire has been most gratifying, and we feel successful. We have been able to accomplish a great deal in an educational way through our pamphlets and leaflets which are sent to the mother of every newborn baby in the State from the time the child is registered until it reaches the age of one year, and our letters and books on the necessity of prenatal care which reach about 15,000 prospective and potential mothers yearly. Our nurses are able to give much valuable service not only in an educational way but in actual help in thousands of homes throughout the State. We have held over 200 child-health conferences which have been a splendid means not only in the correction of physical defects but a means of education to parents and physicians alike.

The work has been received by all concerned in a most satisfactory manner. There has been no complaint from the physicians and the work is highly thought of by the people in general.

Last year New Hampshire had the second greatest drop in infant mortality in the country. We hope that this splendid record will be continued this coming year.

There is very rarely a mail comes to the office but contains letters from mothers thanking us for the service that has been rendered for literature sent and either asking for additional information or for a call from one of our nurses. These letters are all answered, and whatever help the mother desires is given.

The State board of health feels that it is accomplishing a greatly needed piece of work in New Hampshire and sincerely hopes that the Sheppard-Towner funds will be continued for a longer period of time.

Very sincerely yours,

ELENA M. CROUGH, R. N.,
Director Division Maternity, Infancy, and Child Hygiene.

EXCERPTS FROM DESCRIPTION OF WORK IN NEW HAMPSHIRE

Seven nurses who are specialists in maternity and infancy work have been employed by the division during the past year. These nurses visit the homes of newborn babies in their territories to give each mother whatever help or advice she may desire. From the beginning of the work there has been hardly an instance where these health visitors have not been gladly received by the mothers, frequently sent for, and always welcomed as a greatly needed friend. Particularly is this true in the rural sections where distance is great and it is difficult to reach a physician. The nurse is able to help the mother with many problems, set her mind at rest on many subjects, give her proper intelligent prenatal care, take her if necessary to a physician for examination, and do many things to make her more comfortable in mind and body. If her baby needs a doctor's care, the nurse tells her so and sees that a visit is made to the physician's office or that the doctor comes to the home. Her duties are so diversified that it is impossible to enumerate them, but the important thing is she is the recognized friend and helper of mothers and children, both loved and respected wherever she and her work are known.

One of the important services rendered is the establishing of the obstetrical package. This is primarily a service for the physicians, particularly in rural communities, although the cities have also taken advantage of this service. Materials sufficient for three packages are given free of charge by the department. A group of women are instructed how to make and sterilize them. Each package is sold for $2, this money being used to purchase further supplies to continue the work. In a great many instances the prospective mother is too ill or too poor to properly prepare for her confinement, and this carefully made sterilized maternity package may be the means of saving her from puerperal septicemia. Much credit should be given to each group of women carrying on this service in 32 towns in the State.

More intensive and consistent health education is necessary if we are to lessen sickness and disease and if we are to lower maternal and infant mortality. One of the most effective ways to give the necessary information to the public is by means of free literature, lectures, moving pictures, poster display, and lantern slides. Close attention has been paid to all of these. Every mother in New Hampshire receives the latest and best pamphlets, booklets, diet slips, and letters on prenatal, infant, and child care from the time of her baby's birth until it reaches the age of 1 year.

All of our exhibit material is available to the public. Books by noted authorities on these subjects are in our loan library and will be loaned free of charge upon request.

We are encouraging our schools to institute home nursing and child-hygiene classes by loaning equipment necessary for the success of such classes.

Every request to speak on prenatal, infant, and child care is complied with, as we feel that this is one of the best methods of imparting information not only in connection with the maternity and child-hygiene program but on health matters in general.

Giving instruction in prenatal and infant care to groups of mothers and interested women is another important feature of our work. The full course consists of nine lessons concerning all phases of the hygiene of maternity and infancy, but in instances where it is unfeasible to give the full course, three lectures have been arranged that will be most helpful and give a great deal of valuable information. These courses will be given absolutely free of charge to any woman, club, or group of women in the State.

In sections where no nurse is employed, if a mother desires to secure the services of a nurse, a letter addressed to the director of the division, Concord, N. H., will meet with an immediate reply.

NEW JERSEY

STATE OF NEW JERSEY, DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH,
Trenton, March 3, 1926.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR SHEPPARD: Replying to your letter of February 23, would give you the following facts regarding the application of the Sheppard-Towner moneys in the State of New Jersey:

The Legislature of New Jersey passed the enabling act in 1922, and New Jersey participated in the benefits of the Sheppard-Towner Act beginning 1922, when it received $12,000 and each year thereafter $31,284.55.

In addition, the legislature has appropriated directly to the health department for the child-hygiene work $60,000 each year from 1922, with the exception of 1925-26, when it was increased to $65,000.

As a result of the activities of this department, child-hygiene work is established in 258 communities, representing 100 field nurses. Of these nurses 68 are paid by the local communities, and in this way the State is left free to extend its demonstrations and efforts to develop the work throughout the State.

The infant-mortality rate since 1918 has declined from 112 to 69. The maternal mortality rate has been practically stationary. You may be interested in a series of maps which show a reduction of infant mortality by county.

Perhaps the results can be summarized by saying that in 1918, 15 counties were black, which means that the mortality rate was over 100 deaths per 1,000 live births; while in 1924 there were no black counties and but 1 county of the 21 in the State with a mortality rate between 90 and 100.

Trusting this is the desired information, I remain

Very truly yours,

H. B. COSTILL, M. D.,
Director of Health.

NEW MEXICO

STATE OF NEW MEXICO DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WELFARE, BUREAU OF PUBLIC HEALTH,
Santa Fe, March 6, 1926.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Miss Margaret Reeves, director of the State bureau of child welfare, has handed to me your request for data on the operation of the maternity and infancy act in this State, as Miss Reeves's bureau no longer administers these funds.

We compiled recently a summary of statistics for the use of our Senators and Representative, and I am inclosing herewith a copy of these data.

The central State health agency in New Mexico was created in 1919. Naturally, because it was new and untried, its appropriations were exceedingly meager. I think I can safely say that no other contribution from the Federal Government has been productive of so much good as has the allotment for maternity and infancy work, for it made possible the extension to large numbers of rural mothers an educational program that could not have been supported in any other way. Part of this money is now going to the permanent maintenance of public-health nurses connected with full-time county health departments, and they are giving a large share of their time to special health work for mothers and babies.

You have doubtless been made aware of the opposition to a continuance of the Federal allotment on the part of some States and of some medical groups. I am disappointed that physicians should take this attitude and believe that it is chiefly due to a failure to understand the underlying motives of this program. At least in this State the physicians have given the most cordial cooperation to the maternity and infancy nurses, and one county medical society has elected one of our nurses to honorary membership. This seems to me to indicate that the doctors are fundamentally in sympathy with this program once it has been demonstrated to them, and that opposition arises from ignorance of its scope. At the meeting of the American Medical Association in Dallas next month I expect to read a paper in which some of these matters will be discussed. While I do not hope that this will in any way influence the opinions of those who have already made up their minds, I can at least go on record in favor of a continuance of the act and give a statement of our practical experience with it.

I sincerely hope that you will succeed in gaining a continuation of this extremely valuable cooperation.

Respectfully,

G. S. LUCKETT, M. D.,
Director State Bureau of Public Health.

NEW YORK

STATEMENT FILED BY DR. ELIZABETH GARDINER, ACTING DIRECTOR OF THE BUREAU OF MATERNITY, INFANCY, AND CHILD HYGIENE, STATE DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH, ALBANY, N. Y., WITH HOUSE COMMITTEE ON INTER-STATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE, JANUARY 14, 1926

The following is a brief statement of the work done in New York State under the provisions of the Federal maternity and infancy act during the fiscal year July 1, 1924, to July 1, 1925:

Administrative agency: Department of health, division of maternity, infancy, and child hygiene.

Staff: Director, associate director (physician), executive clerk (physician), 4 physicians, 23 staff nurses (and 24 part-time maternity and infancy community nurses employed from Sheppard-Towner and local funds), 3 county nurses, 2 midwife inspectors (nurses), 1 organizing field agent, 1 office manager, 4 clerks, 8 stenographers, 1 advance agent, 1 chauffeur.

Activities: Child-health conferences, 236, at which 4,895 children were examined. In addition to the conferences conducted by the State staff, 2,049 conferences were conducted in local communities where the staff was partly supported by maternity and infancy funds, with 17,694 children attending, and 6,027 physical examinations made. In selecting communities in which the State units were to conduct child-health conferences preference was given to those most likely to continue them on a local basis after one or two demonstrations by the State unit.

Prenatal conferences, 155, at which 525 examinations were made. The local staffs partly supported by maternity and infancy funds held 1,488 additional conferences, with 8,406 women in attendance, and 3,116 examined. The prenatal conferences conducted by the State unit were organized by a nurse who made the preliminary arrangements, called on prospective patients, obtained the permission of physicians for patients' attendance, and, if necessary, made the follow-up visits on patients who attended the conferences. If there was a local nurse, she generally did the follow-up work.

New permanent child health centers established, 30, making a total of 28 centers partly supported by maternity and infancy funds. In addition 108 were entirely supported by municipal or private funds. These were given advisory and supervisory service by the State division and report to it.

New permanent parental centers established, 10.

Mothers' classes, 154 class groups, with a membership of 2,217 taught by State staff, 236 taught by local staffs.

In 28 communities child-health consultations have been carried on by part-time physicians, who receive an honorarium from Federal funds. These consultations are held regularly either monthly or twice monthly throughout the year.

Sixteen specialists in obstetrics and pediatrics served as regional consultants for the division, they aiding in the progress of maternity and infancy work in various parts of the State by addressing medical societies and other groups of physicians, conducting graduate courses in obstetrics and pediatrics, and conducting pediatric clinics. These consultants received a small compensation on the per diem basis for their services. During the year two courses in obstetrics, consisting of six lectures on prenatal care, postpartum care, management of normal labor, pathology of pregnancy (two lectures), and pathology of labor, were given to county medical societies; and a clinical group of physicians on Long Island gave one course of pediatric clinics. The course in pediatrics covered natural feeding, artificial feeding, nutritional disturbances, tuberculosis and cardiac diseases in young children, posture or office orthopedics, and protective inoculations.

Six community demonstrations were made.

¹ Items 2 and 3 cover entire period of Sheppard-Towner activities within the State.

NORTH CAROLINA

NORTH CAROLINA STATE BOARD OF HEALTH,
Raleigh, April 2, 1926.

Senator MORRIS SHEPPARD,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR SHEPPARD: Your letter of March 27, relative to what part the Sheppard-Towner Act plays in the maternity and infancy work of North Carolina, has been received.

The State, together with Federal funds derived from the Sheppard-Towner Act, participates financially on a 50-50 basis with every county in the State desiring to undertake maternity and infancy work in accordance with a plan jointly approved by the State board of health and the Children's Bureau of the Department of Labor. The county budget usually consists of $2,500, of which amount the State contributes $625; the Children's Bureau, $625; and the county, $1,250. It is expected that this basis of financial cooperation will be continued for a period of one or two years, after which there will be a gradual reduction of State and Federal funds and a gradual increase of county funds until a period is reached at which time the counties can assume their full responsibility.

Trusting this information is what you desire and that you will be successful in securing the continuance of the appropriation of the Sheppard-Towner Act in Congress, I am,

Very truly yours,

H. A. TAYLOR, M. D.,

Director Bureau of Maternity and Infancy.

SUMMARY OF WORK IN NORTH DAKOTA UNDER MATERNITY ACT

Administrative agency: Department of public health, division of child hygiene and public-health nursing.

Staff: Director, 1 nurse, 1 clerk.

Activities: Child-health conferences, 127, at which 2,817 examinations were made. Many of the conferences were return visits to communities in which conferences had been held last year. In these places it was found that an encouraging number of the defects noted by the examining physician at the conference of the previous year had been corrected. Prenatal conferences were held in conjunction with the child-health conferences. Mothers were advised concerning prenatal care, and any mother desiring an examination was given one. The State bureau received more requests to hold conferences in various communities of the State than it could fill.

Campaigns: Assistance was given in the birth-registration campaign in the first six months of the year. North Dakota entered the birth and death registration area in December, 1925, as a result of the campaign.

New permanent child-health centers established, 2.

New permanent prenatal centers established, 1.

Lectures and talks by staff members, 69.

Literature distributed, 15,846 pamphlets of various kinds.

Volunteer assistance was given by 22 physicians, 19 nurses, and 336 lay workers. The physicians have cooperated throughout the State, and much of the success of the conference work was due to their support in creating local interest, as well as their aid at the conferences. Local organizations have been helpful in preparing for the conferences.

The child-health conferences held annually in connection with the State fair have aroused so much interest that a special building was planned for the accommodation of future conference work at the fairs.

OHIO

STATE OF OHIO DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH,
Columbus, March 3, 1926.

Mr. MORRIS SHEPPARD,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SHEPPARD: In answer to your letter of February 24 may I send you a copy of the last annual report as prepared by my predecessor? Our program for this year includes most of the items of the maternal and infant welfare program carried on by other States. We are demonstrating public-health nursing services in the counties by holding children's clinics, broadcasting information through talks, printed matter, and the healthmobile, organizing little mothers' leagues, giving radio talks, etc.

The reports of the State department of health on Sheppard-Towner activities, however, do not constitute a fair measure of the total amount of work done in our State. This is because of the unique organization of Ohio's health work in accordance with the Hughes-Griswold act, which tends to decentralize health work so that most of it is carried on not by the State department of health but by the local county health districts. We feel that our main function is to lead the way and to encourage our local health officers and nurses. It has been somewhat difficult to fit the provisions of the Sheppard-Towner Act into this scheme of organization, but I am quite certain that we have been successful and with very gratifying results.

Sincerely yours,

H. E. KLEINSCHMIDT, M. D.,
Chief, Division of Child Hygiene.

PLAN OF ADMINISTRATION OF THE SHEPPARD-TOWNER ACT IN OHIO, 1923-1925

For the furtherance of efficient and comprehensive health service and for the dissemination of knowledge as means to assist in the reduction of maternal and infant morbidity and mortality, the following plan is proposed:

1. Education.

A. Lectures before medical societies and local health organizations by obstetricians and pediatricians of national repute.

B. Institutes: Organized at convenient points for physicians, health commissioners, and nurses.

C. Clinics.

1. Prenatal.

2. Preschool.

3. Orthopedic: Purely diagnostic and educational in nature and always referring patients back to the family physician.

D. Instruction to nurses: By printed outlines or correspondence, or in small specially organized groups upon the specific problems of maternity and infancy.

E. Demonstrations: These demonstrations will be organized in order—

1. To assist the community in recognizing and practicing minimum standards for the hygiene and welfare of maternity;

2. To carry to potential and expectant mothers through conferences and demonstrations practical methods of personal and child care;

3. To cooperate with the medical profession in the educational and diagnostic phases of the management of pregnancy and infancy;

4. To stimulate a greater interest in the vital statistics of these periods of life;

5. To promote a coordination of effort among all agencies interested in maternity and infancy;

6. To emphasize these general public health measures which are essential to the success of any personal or public health program.

The general organization of these demonstrations will be under the direct supervision of the Ohio Department of Health. It is hoped that certain assistance will be furnished by local official and voluntary, professional and social agencies.

The local administration of these demonstrations should be arranged jointly by the general or city health districts and the Ohio State Department of Health. The demonstrations should continue for a reasonable period until the State Department shall have been furnished evidence that the work will or will not be continued by local effort. The following procedures are advisable before the actual work is begun:

1. The preliminary meetings with the county medical, dental, and other societies to present the objects and extent of the proposed demonstration.

2. Preliminary survey of the local problem and facilities.

3. Arrangements for office space and for cooperative assistance from professional and social groups.

4. Meetings, at various times, of public officials and representatives from official and voluntary organizations and societies to adopt plans for the permanent prosecution of the work.

It is very essential that the medical profession and laity both understand thoroughly that these demonstrations are solely educational and diagnostic in nature. In every instance the professional relationship between patient and physician will be preserved. The demonstration will in no instance assume actual corrective or treatment measures.

The home visitation and conference educational and demonstration work will be carried on by nurses and physicians. This work will be carried to prospective mothers and into homes where there are children, with the consent and approval of the family physician, and then only after he has been made familiar with the nature of the information to be given. It is not contemplated that such educational work should be limited to subjects pertaining solely to the hygiene of the maternal and infant periods. The subjects covered should include all those phases of public health which bear upon general health promotion of the mother during the important periods of pregnancy and delivery as well as the specialized applications of public health principles pertaining to the hygiene and welfare of infancy and the preschool period.

OKLAHOMA

STATE OF OKLAHOMA,
DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC HEALTH,
Oklahoma City, March 3, 1926.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: It gives me great pleasure to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 24th ultimo and to try to advise you in a general way as to what has been accomplished by the act in our State. However, the thing you ask is indeed difficult, quite as difficult as to look at a boy of 4 and estimate his value at 60. The infancy act, looked at through my own eyes (although I admit I might be prejudiced), bids fair to be nothing short of an Abraham Lincoln, should its life be spared and its possibilities developed.

Prior to the acceptance of the act, no appropriation had been made for the health and welfare of these groups, and Oklahoma being only 18 years old has had little time to develop anything in the way of instruction in maternal and infancy hygiene through volunteer and official organizations. Aside from our two largest cities, in each of which there is a very efficient but inadequate nursing organization, the only instruction available to the mother, aside from that through this bureau, is from the physician or the occasional unlicensed, untrained midwife.

The accomplishments of this bureau probably are best seen in the change of attitude shown by the general public and the professional groups. The mothers are beginning to sense their rights and responsibilities as regards proper prenatal care, proper care at the time of delivery, proper aftercare, proper care of the infant, and proper care of the preschool child. They are eagerly acquainting themselves with the accepted standards of excellence as regards prenatal, natal, and postnatal infant and child care, and are asking that the care they get approximate these standards. In turn they are beginning to sense their tremendous responsibilities of citizenship in giving to the community a superior people physically, mentally, and morally.

The medical profession, recognizing the part it plays in this new order of things, is rising to the need. This is evidenced by the number of doctors taking postgraduate work in obstetrics and pediatrics and in the number making changes of location. Just recently a three months' postgraduate course in pediatrics has been launched in seven counties of the State with 146 physicians enrolled. Other county societies are demanding the instruction, and they will be visited as soon as the extension department of the university, which is responsible for this work, can reach them. A number of new hospitals have been built, and each one has made, or is making, special provision for maternity work.

The dentists are cooperating with the bureau almost as a unit in furthering the subject of dental education, and the graduate private-duty nurses are showing such an interest that the bureau just at this time is outlining an intensive postgraduate course in maternal and infant hygiene, which will be available to them as well as to all senior pupils in the accredited nurse training schools.

So great is the interest being shown in the rural home-making clubs that at least one home demonstration agent remarks that if this interest in health continues, she will be unable to complete her own project. Probably the most revolutionary change of attitude is the interest in and the demand for special training in maternal and infant hygiene by the normal schools, the other schools of higher learning, the high schools, and even the grades. Since Oklahoma introduced child care and training in its public-school curriculum in 1923 and since the teachers of home economics have been getting theoretical with some practical training in these subjects for three or four years, it was an easy matter to work out a cooperative scheme whereby the special, technical skill, literature, and equipment of the bureau could supplement that of the instructors in home economics in both the teacher-training and the public schools, so that the maternity and infancy program may be standardized for the entire State.

Something of the growth of the work can be sensed by a comparison of the following figures:

The number of county fairs visited upon our own initiative in 1924 was 32.

The number visited upon special request of the interested authorities in 1925 was 56.

The approximate number of mothers getting the prenatal and postnatal letters in 1924 was 2,000.

The exact number getting letters in 1925 was 6,751.

The number of talks and lectures given by the staff (exclusive of that of the director) upon the initiative of the staff in 1924 was 447.

The number given by the State staff (exclusive of the director) and upon special request of the interested organizations in 1925 was 1,505.

We are happy to advise that as soon as we could make our position clear to the various professions and the general public we have had nothing but the most hearty cooperation from all the official and non-official health and educational institutions in the State. The press, too, has been very helpful.

That the mothers appreciate this service is evidenced by the many letters of appreciation coming to us daily, copies of a few of which will be sent you. My own opinion is that the Sheppard-Towner Act promises to fulfill in our State everything that is expected of it by its authors and its friends, but more time is needed in which to "clinch" the program that shows such phenomenal promise.

Assuring you of our gratitude for your efforts in behalf of the mothers and infants, we are,

Yours very sincerely,

LUCILE SPIRO BLACHLY, M. D.,

Director.

OREGON

OREGON STATE BOARD OF HEALTH,
BUREAU OF PUBLIC HEALTH NURSING AND CHILD HYGIENE,
Portland, Oreg., March 6, 1926.

Senator MORRIS SHEPPARD,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: There is no doubt in the minds of those of us who have worked close to the bureau of child hygiene, through which the provisions of the Sheppard-Towner Act function in this State, of the success of this very splendid work. As Oregon was the fifth State to accept the provisions of the Sheppard-Towner Act, we have had time to measure some of the results of our program, and feel that at least we have succeeded in arousing a very great interest in better child health in every section we have contacted.

Our program for the first year, 1922, as outlined by Miss Cecil Schreyer, assistant director of the bureau of child hygiene, and further enlarged upon by Dr. Estella Ford Warner, who was appointed director upon Miss Schreyer's resignation, included:

1. The issuance of prenatal letters: A series of nine advisory letters sent out upon request to any expectant mother residing in the State.

2. Form letters were sent out advising physicians, clubs, and other organizations of these letters and asking their cooperation. Articles were sent to papers also.

3. Distribution of literature on prenatal care and child care.

4. Establishment of child-welfare clinics over the State.

5. Addresses and talks before clubs and other organizations telling them of the work of the bureau.

6. Supplying individuals and organizations with information and material on maternal and child welfare.

7. Affiliating with the University of Oregon School of Social Work for lectures and field service.

During the first year and a half the mailing list for the prenatal letters reached the 1,200 mark, and 82 clinics, at which 3,500 children were examined, were held. Out of 36 counties, 22 were reached during this period, some of the most interesting clinics held being in the most isolated sections of our State.

During the second year a series of three postnatal letters was added to the educational program, and certificates of birth, together with a letter to parents telling them of the services of the bureau, were sent to all parents with babies born outside of the city of Portland. This has brought in a satisfactory return in the way of requests for advice and literature as well as appreciation.

During the spring and fall of 1923 lectures on maternal and infant hygiene were given in connection with courses at the University of Oregon and the Oregon Agricultural College, and a series of lectures and class work was presented at the summer session of the university extension. Studies were made by the bureau statistician concerning the incidents and causes of stillbirth and the causes of infant and maternal mortality.

In 1924 a series of four prenatal clinics was arranged for in cooperation with the obstetrical department of the University of Oregon Medical School and the Portland Visiting Nurses' Association. These clinics offer services to those who could not otherwise afford prenatal care and also serve as a teaching center for the medical students.

In July of this past year one of the weekly letters of the State board of health called attention to the work of the bureau of child hygiene and asked that doctors, nurses, and people interested in prenatal letters send in names to this office for this service. This letter was reprinted in most of the county newspapers, and has resulted in a marked increase in the number of prenatal letters.

Relative to the prenatal letters, we frequently meet mothers out over the State who express their appreciation of the advice they have received in this way.

In the five counties where there is a full-time unit and where the nurses are paid from Sheppard-Towner funds, there has been a most intensive maternity and infancy program carried on during the past year. Three permanent infant and preschool clinic centers have been established, little mothers' classes have been organized, demonstrations have been made of the obstetrical kit for home deliveries, and infant and preschool clinics have been held in various parts of the counties. In one county a dental survey was made of all the school children which has resulted in the establishment of a permanent dental clinic. In two of these counties much work has been done in the schools relative to immunization for diphtheria and scarlet fever.

Owing to the resignation of Doctor Warner in January, the Children's Bureau kindly loaned us a clinician for state-wide clinics during the latter part of the summer. Eighteen clinics were held, covering the different sections of the State pretty thoroughly, and over 1,000 children were examined. Many of these clinics were held in most isolated sections and were very well attended, showing the results of the intensive clinic program held previously. In going over this territory with the clinician, one of the most hopeful indications of the good results of the Sheppard-Towner work that I observed is the intelligent interest the young mothers are taking in their children and the desire expressed for more frequent clinics. They are very anxious that we come back again this year and plan for two or three day clinics in each place so that all the mothers may be benefited.

We find, too, that there are many more requests on the part of the young mother for information such as is given out through this bureau as to feeding, posture, habit training, etc. * * * The young mother is calling for later literature on child nutrition and development and is demanding the very best for her child in every respect.

We are very anxious in this section of the country to see the Sheppard-Towner work continued through another five-year period, which would place our work on a most substantial basis.

Very truly yours,

GLENDORA M. BLAKELY, R. N.,
Assistant Director, Bureau of Child Hygiene.

PENNSYLVANIA

STATEMENT OF DR. MARY BIGGS NOBLE, DIRECTOR OF ADMINISTRATION OF THE SHEPPARD-TOWNER ACT FOR THE STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA, BEFORE HOUSE INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE COMMITTEE, JANUARY 14, 1926

Doctor NOBLE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to say at the beginning that we have the very greatest latitude in making our plans in Pennsylvania.

I had the honor to be in the division work before any Federal money was available, and our plans were simply laid aside because there was no money to carry them on, and it was simply the matter of getting out those plans and starting them when the money was available.

The three points that I shall make are that we are starting permanent child-health work, going into communities, and making such a basis that if we were suddenly swept off the map, either in the central office or federally, that community would have a good deal within itself to keep going for its own babies and mothers.

We could not put our fingers on 25 child-health centers outside of Pittsburgh and Harrisburg when we started to interest the local committees in this work. We have now 418 permanent centers. A good many of those the State has not been directly responsible for, but outside of Harrisburg almost every single center uses something that our division supplies, either our advice, our organizing help, or our literature and record forms.

For example, in one county they have reduced their infant death rate to 46, where the State rate is 78, and I think it can be safely said that practically every child under 6 is under the supervision of the public health nurse and locally interested women. They only lost three mothers in that county, with a population of 40,000, last year.

In the second place, we are attacking, which is our worst problem, the deaths of the mothers, and I want to show you the map that we made out showing the deaths of mothers in Pennsylvania [showing map of Pennsylvania]. Each pin is a mother who died in 1924. We lost altogether 1,337 mothers. We have scarcely made a dent in that situation, and we admit that is one reason, and I think perhaps they very best argument, why we should have more time with money going on to help us out. Everybody is working on it. All scientists and physicians are more interested than they have ever been before.

In these two things the spontaneous interest of the physicians and the automatic response in the communities is something that, in contrast to three years ago, is almost more than we could have anticipated. Doctors were not understanding, and certainly not very much interested, in our preventive work, and we now have over 700 physicians interested in both the baby work and the other work. There are 12,000 physicians all told in the State, and a very large proportion of them are interested in this work. We look back over three years and we feel that we have their friendliness and their interest and their cooperation, and that they understand the program as they never did before.

The most spectacular thing we have done, perhaps, is to interest the midwives. In nine counties we have full-time women physicians supervising, controlling, and instructing midwives. Midwives to the number of 666 are being controlled and supervised. There the infant death rate just after birth—what we call the "neonatal," new-born death rate—was 23.7, where the rate for the State is very much higher. And their maternal death rate in 11,000 deliveries was only three as against a rate for the State of six point something. We feel that if we can control the midwives as we are doing now through the whole State, and particularly in the rural areas, in the coal region, where there were more foreigners and where it is the most pressing problem, that we can be doing the best work.

SOUTH CAROLINA

SOUTH CAROLINA STATE BOARD OF HEALTH,
Columbia, S. C., March 13, 1926.

Senator MORRIS SHEPPARD,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR SHEPPARD: In response to your inquiry as to what has been accomplished in South Carolina by the infancy maternity act I can cite the following:

Two thousand six hundred and thirty midwives have been given a course of instruction in the proper care of mothers and babies. This course has consisted of 10 lectures and as many practical demonstrations. At the conclusion of it those women who have shown an understanding of the teaching are given permission to practice for a year under the supervision of the State field nurses. As half the women in South Carolina are cared for at childbirth by midwives, it is evident how important this work is.

Nine hundred and twenty mothers have been given a course of 22 lessons in the hygiene of the home and the care of infants and young children, and over 3,000 others have had 10 or more lessons in child care.

One thousand one hundred and eighty-three girls have joined Little Mothers' League groups to learn how to care for babies. As these are generally seventh and eighth grade girls who will before many years marry and have children of their own this is certainly a thing of value to the community as well as to the students themselves.

One thousand eight hundred and twelve baby conferences have been held, at which 28,947 infants and preschool children were examined and the mothers advised as to their care and treatment.

We have been able to do a great deal of educational work leading toward the establishment of prenatal clinics and better care for women before and at the time of confinement.

Our infant-mortality rate has been lowered to 91.4 this past year, but we consider that the fact that these children who do not die are also being cared for in a more intelligent way, so they will grow up to be more useful and efficient citizens, is of equal importance.

Much remains to be done, especially along the line of prenatal care. This most important branch of the work is always the most difficult to put across because of the hesitancy of expectant mothers about coming to clinics, so that the nurse must bring about the education of these women by repeated home visits.

We do feel now, however, that a beginning has been made and that a few more years will enable us to reach every part of our State with an educational program that will result in a permanent lowering of our maternal and infant death rate.

I am inclosing a letter just received asking for help from us. This letter is fairly typical. We seldom get letters from women acknowledging our help, because when we receive such a letter as this we refer it to our nearest public-health nurse and ask her to visit the woman and keep in touch with her as long as she needs advice and assistance. Our reports then come in through the nurse.

Frequently women who have brought a sickly baby to a child-health conference return the next year with a healthy child and tell us quite proudly that they have followed the doctor's instructions to the letter and are more than pleased with the result.

If there is any more information that I can give you that would be of value or interest, I will gladly furnish it.

Sincerely yours,

ADA TAYLOR GRAHAM, Director.

SOUTH DAKOTA

STATE BOARD OF HEALTH,
DIVISION OF CHILD HYGIENE,
Waubay, March 2, 1926.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SHEPPARD: Complying with your request of February 25, I am very glad to forward to you a copy of the report of the work of the South Dakota division of child hygiene, cooperating with the United States Children's Bureau under the provisions of the Sheppard-Towner Act. The report covers the period from the time the Sheppard-Towner appropriation became available to December 31, 1925, but is only a brief summary and is listed as a reference in the program of study for the child welfare department of the South Dakota Federation of Women's Clubs.

Inclosed also, as requested, are copies of a number of letters from individuals who have received or observed some benefit from our work.

It is my sincere hope that the Members of Congress will feel that the work under the Sheppard-Towner Act throughout the States has been of sufficient value to justify its continuance.

I should like to take this opportunity to express to you my personal appreciation of your efforts in this field. Working among the people, as I do, I can see the great benefit that it has been to thousands of people throughout the United States, directly and indirectly.

Very truly yours,

STATE BOARD OF HEALTH,
CLARA E. HAYES, M. D.,
Director, Division of Child Hygiene.

WORK OF THE SOUTH DAKOTA DIVISION OF CHILD HYGIENE

The division of child hygiene administers the United States Sheppard-Towner fund for maternity and infancy, the State appropriation to match that fund, and the appropriation made by the last legislature for crippled children.

A budget of both State and Federal funds for maternity and infancy is submitted annually to the United States Children's Bureau for approval. The privilege of rebudgeting semiannually is granted in case the year's work can not be carried out as planned. In addition to the entire State appropriation, a large amount of the Federal allotment remaining after deducting the cost of administration is used for actual work within the State.

The best information on the purpose and duties of the division of child hygiene I believe is a report of the work done since it began operation. Following is a summary of the work up to December 31, 1925.

NURSING

The division of public-health nursing has been maintained. The supervisor of public-health nursing secures properly qualified nurses for county and school work and supervises and helps all public-health nurses in the State. She makes advance arrangements in the field for mother and baby clinics, assists the director of the division with such clinics, and conducts mothers' classes. For the past eight months a field nurse has been employed. She makes arrangements for and assists with the mother and baby clinics and arranges for and conducts classes for mothers.

Financial assistance has been given to Harding, Perkins, Corson, and Dewey Counties in the employment of county nurses who have carried out special programs of maternity and infancy work in addition to the general public-health nursing. Whole-time county health departments have been organized in Pennington and Yankton Counties with financial aid from the International health board. These departments, together with Brown County whole-time health department, have received some financial help. Each department employs two or three public-health nurses who carry out intensified maternity and infancy programs.

All arrangements have been made for more than a year to give Harding County further help with the maintenance of a public-health nursing program, but no nurse can be found to take the work.

MATERNITY AND PRESCHOOL CLINICS

These clinics give opportunity to expectant mothers for physical examination and advice and for physical examination of children of preschool age and advice to their parents regarding the correction of physical abnormalities and proper care. In the clinics conducted by the director of the division and State supervising nurse, the field physician and nurse working five months in 1924 and 1925, and the physicians and nurses of counties helped financially 8,135 children and 122 expectant mothers have been given examination. Clinics were held in 62 counties and 159 towns once and in 40 counties and 91 towns twice. In the whole-time county health departments, 145 expectant mothers and 735 infants have been under supervision.

EDUCATIONAL WORK

The South Dakota Mother's Book has been revised. A copy is sent to the mother of each child whose birth is reported to the State board of health. In all phases of our work the importance of birth registration is emphasized. Although South Dakota is not in the United States birth registration area, for the past four years the rate of births reported has been slightly higher than the average rate of reporting in the birth registration area.

A small publication on infant feeding has been prepared and many copies are sent out upon request.

Special instructions on prenatal care have been sent out upon request to 7,941 expectant mothers.

Four hundred and ten lectures have been given on maternity and child-health subjects, most of which have been illustrated with special films.

The last phase of educational work to be developed is the mothers' classes, consisting of eight lessons covering the whole period of pregnancy. The last two lessons are demonstrations of the preparation of materials for confinement and things necessary for the baby. With each of the first six lessons an additional demonstration of some phase of the care of the baby during the first month of life is given. Several county nurses have conducted mothers' classes. The State supervising nurse and the field nurse have just completed 10 courses in Jackson, Jones, Lyman, Brule, McCook, and Division Counties, with a total enrollment of 169 members. The attendance at these classes increased with each lesson. Many of the members walked over a mile and several as far as two miles and a half to attend. There have been numerous expressions of gratitude for the work and of the benefit which it has already been to the members. The classes are usually held in the home of one of the members. All materials, including typed outlines for each member, is provided by the division of child hygiene. Twelve more classes have been planned to begin in January. Six of these will be in Butte, Lawrence, and Meade Counties, and six in Deuel, Hamlin, and Clark Counties.

TENNESSEE

STATE OF TENNESSEE, DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC HEALTH,

Nashville, March 13, 1926.

HON. MORRIS SHEPPARD,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Dr. W. J. Breeding has asked me to make a general statement on the accomplishments as a result of the expenditure of money in Tennessee under the Sheppard-Towner Act. The statement can be quite brief, for definite statistical evidence can be presented.

Two types of work in this field are in progress in Tennessee. The first is a generalized program for counties in which there are no full-time local health organizations. Obviously, work of this kind will not lend itself to any definite statement as to its value until after a considerable period of time. We believe its principal value at present is that resulting from general educational activity; that is, a shortening of the lines of communication between the sources of health information and the individual mother who must profit by our knowledge of health principles if these principles are to have practical value. We think that our activities in this field have had considerable value and present as evidence a better understanding of health problems, which is quite apparent to our field workers.

The second form of activity in which we are engaged is specific in nature and principally performed by nurses attached to local full-time health organizations, mainly consisting of full-time county health departments. In addition to the work being done in cooperation with county health departments, some counties are maintaining county nursing units without full-time health departments. Evidence of the improvement of conditions in these areas is definitely shown by the slow but sure and consistent decline in the infant-mortality rate, which is a very sensitive index. If the infant-mortality rate for the State as a whole had been as low as the rate in the areas where this work is being done, Tennessee would have lost 167 fewer babies than it actually lost in 1924. Needless to say, we are extending this plan of activity to our counties as rapidly as possible. A statistical study of maternal-mortality rates has not yet been possible, but I feel confident similar results would be shown.

Very truly yours,

E. L. BISHOP, M. D.,
Commissioner of Health.

TEXAS

TEXAS STATE BOARD OF HEALTH,
Austin, Tex., March 3, 1926.

HON. MORRIS SHEPPARD,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR SHEPPARD: Your letter of February 25 received. I am inclosing letters for your use. I am sending originals, as we are taking these out of our files to throw away. We have thousands of letters of this type, and only one letter in our six years of operation in Texas condemning our work.

The one complete file that I am sending—the Spur, Tex., file—is in regard to laboratory tests made on a case, the result of which probably saved the mother's life. Where we have a nurse in the county, this is handled through the county nurse.

We have 28 maternity and infancy nurses in Texas, doing full-time work and putting on a county-wide program. We have one itinerant nurse, one negro nurse, and a supervisor with one assistant, who is also an advisory nurse. We have a maternity home inspector, which is required by the State law. The State law also requires that we furnish prophylactic drops for indigent cases, and we supply silver nitrate.

We have located 2,576 midwives, each one of whom is supplied with birth-certificate blanks and silver nitrate. Midwife classes are held in counties where we have a maternity and infancy nursing service.

We send a letter to the mother of every baby whose birth is registered. Copy of this letter is included, with reply attached. With this letter is inclosed a card, listing pamphlets for mothers of young children. On requests through these cards we send out between two and four thousand pamphlets a month.

These pamphlets are secured from the Children's Bureau at Washington.

I am sending you a copy, one month's issue of the Gleaner, which gives you the report of the field work for that month, statistical and narrative. This goes out monthly to the nurses, and will give you an idea of our field work.

Our prenatal files carry an average of 2,000 names a month, of mothers asking for literature on prenatal care. The nurses in the counties hold classes for expectant mothers and mothers of young children.

Every woman's organization in Texas has a child hygiene division which is working in connection with the Department of Health to make the child-hygiene program as general as it is possible.

We are not in the birth-registration area, but we have estimated a loss of 9,000 babies a year in Texas under 1 year of age, and 900 mothers who die in childbirth. We are working to decrease this very high percentage, most of which is due to lack of prenatal care.

If I can give you further information, I shall be glad indeed to do so.

Very truly yours,

H. N. BARNETT, M. D.,
Director, Bureau of Child Hygiene.

UTAH

UTAH STATE BOARD OF HEALTH,
BUREAU OF CHILD HYGIENE,
Salt Lake City, Utah, April 3, 1926.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Response to yours of recent date has been delayed by my absence in the field and other interferences. I trust the following information may not be too late for your purpose:

The bureau of child hygiene of the State board of health, which was designated to direct the work of the Sheppard-Towner activities in Utah, has organized health centers in all of the counties of the State. To date 121 centers have been established in charge of local committees, at which well-baby clinics or conferences have been held at intervals. Examinations of the children have been made by the director of the bureau, supplemented by local physicians where available. Maternity welfare has been stressed at the centers and through literature sent from the office of the board of health. Follow-up work to secure the correction of defects discovered has been carried on by public-health nurses as far as possible.

During the period from January 23, 1922, to December 31, 1925, 26,105 examinations have been made at the health centers. Of these, 6,115 were reported normal, while the balance of 19,990 had one or more physical defects, totalling 38,719, thus showing an average of 1.48 defects per child examined. As a result of these examinations we have been able to have a great many defects corrected, underweight children have been brought to normal, tonsils and adenoids have been removed, teeth filled, and other conditions remedied too numerous to mention, while thousands have been immunized against diphtheria and smallpox. The prevention of goiter has been stressed to the expectant mother and the parents of little children, with the result that many are now taking preventive treatment for this condition. Mothers everywhere have expressed their great appreciation of the assistance thus given them, while many of the grandmothers have said, "How I wish I could have had such help when I was raising my family."

The work has proved of very great value. The promotion of maternity and infancy welfare has been farther advanced in Utah than would otherwise have been possible in many years. The discontinuance of the work at this time would be disastrous, because the demonstration of its benefits has not reached a stage of completion that will insure its permanency.

Respectfully yours,

H. Y. RICHARDS, M. D.,
Director, Bureau of Child Hygiene.

SUMMARY OF WORK IN UTAH

Administrative agency: State board of health, bureau of child hygiene.

Staff: Director (physician), 1 physician (part time), 1 staff nurse, 3 county nurses (part time), 2 clerks.

Activities: Child-health conferences, 234, at which 7,972 examinations were made.

Prenatal conferences, 54, with an attendance of 130. These were held in conjunction with child-health conferences. Expectant mothers were given instruction in prenatal care only.

Mothers' classes, 55 class sessions. A total attendance of 1,112 women was reported at the classes held during the last half of the year. The number in attendance at classes held during the first half year was not reported.

Little mothers' classes, 4.

Home demonstrations, 123. These included demonstration of layettes, infant care, and the preparation of infant and child diets.

Home visits, 2,296.

Maternity homes inspected, 7.

Infant homes inspected, 1.

Surveys made in two counties to secure information on such points as existing sanitary conditions, health resources, social agencies, etc., of each town in the county. This information was used in formulating plans of work in these two counties.

New permanent child-health centers established, 50.

Lectures and talks by staff members, 241.

Literature distributed, 13,594 Federal and State bulletins.

Exhibits: Charts, posters, slides, and other exhibit material have been prepared for fairs and meetings of various organizations. New graphs have been made showing the trend of infant mortality and morbidity rates in the State. These have been exhibited in the State offices and at other places where they might be of interest to the public.

Volunteer assistance was given by 75 physicians, 20 dentists, 28 nurses, and 722 lay workers. In so large a State the best method of work for the comparatively small staff has seemed to be to have one of the staff nurses go into a community, and after noting general health conditions and other relevant facts confer with the various clubs, churches, and other organizations, to interest them in the establishment of a health center. The next step was to have them appoint a temporary committee to prepare for the later arrival of a member of the medical profession, or a nurse, to give a demonstration of child-health work. These demonstrations were given good publicity in advance and the attendance was excellent. The visitors then were asked whether the examinations of their children were of value and whether they cared to make the organization permanent. The term "permanent organization" serves merely to indicate that some one is responsible for keeping the work going in the long intervals which must elapse between the visits of members of the State staff. The local physicians were expected to conduct the conferences and were requested to report the number of children examined, types of defects found, etc. If possible, the conferences were held in public-school buildings.

As a result of this work done by the State bureau, 50 new permanent health centers have been established this year, at which periodic child-health conferences are conducted by local personnel.

Tabulations were made of the results of the 11,562 examinations made at 386 child-health conferences held in 25 counties by the State staff or by local forces. These tables showed such points as number of children coming to the conferences for the first time, number of children returning for examination, and number and kind of defects found. Correction was recorded of 1,409 of the 14,681 defects noted.

VERMONT

STATE OF VERMONT,
DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC HEALTH,
Burlington, Vt., March 18, 1926.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your request for information regarding the working of the Sheppard-Towner maternity act in this State, I beg to say that our work has been in progress for so short a time that it is as yet impossible to state results. However, so far as we have gone with the work, it promises well.

Our field nurse is already beginning to see results of her efforts, and the people are increasing their interest. Further than this, our progress in obtaining increased accuracy in vital statistics has been very satisfactory, and I feel that if the Sheppard-Towner work had accomplished no other result in this State than that shown in vital statistics it would still be thoroughly worth while.

Yours very truly,

CHAS. F. DALTON, Special Agent.

VIRGINIA

COMMONWEALTH OF VIRGINIA,
STATE BOARD OF HEALTH,
BUREAU OF CHILD WELFARE,
Richmond, March 9, 1926.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR SHEPPARD: I regret the delay in replying to your letter of February 25, in which you ask for information regarding the accomplishments in Virginia under the acceptance act for Sheppard-Towner funds. I have been out in the field, and your letter has just come to my attention.

The bureau of child welfare was established in 1918, though without direct appropriation until 1920. During the four years to 1922 the principal emphasis was laid on the healthy school child, and health education in the schools was the greatest activity. However, the need for maternity and infancy work was clearly seen, and during the summer months some attempt was made to reach mothers through child-welfare conferences. Also in order to stimulate public-health nursing to safeguard the health of school children in rural districts a small amount of money was set aside to aid in establishing such nursing service. It was not until 1922, when through the acceptance act Virginia received Sheppard-Towner funds, that a definite program for maternity and infancy work could be inaugurated.

From this time on various activities were gradually put into operation as the need became apparent and funds were available. With the assistance of this Federal appropriation, we have been enabled to help to support on an average 40 nurses a year in as many communities. We give from $200 to $500 a year toward a nurse's salary, and she is required to devote one-fourth of her time to maternity and infancy welfare work, including prenatal and postnatal instruction to mothers, and teaching midwife, home nursing, and mothers' classes.

We were enabled to put on an intensive study of the midwife situation in Virginia. There are 6,000 midwives in Virginia, most of them illiterate, ignorant, and superstitious. A large majority of these are negroes, and many of these attend white women. One-third of the mothers in Virginia are attended by midwives. Midwife classes have been organized in 34 counties where there are no public-health nurses and in 32 where there are nurses.

We give a course of eight lessons. Efforts are being made to eliminate the most ignorant and superstitious of these midwives, and to train a better class of women to take up this work under the supervision of doctors. Such women will be called doctors' helpers rather than midwives.

Child-welfare conferences have been held wherever requested. These conferences are of two kinds, permanent where there are health stations to which mothers are encouraged to bring their children regularly for instruction, and itinerant where the mothers come in groups to appointed places with their babies and preschool children for examination and instruction. In the past three years 6,385 children have been examined in the itinerant conferences alone.

One of the most far-reaching educational pieces of work put on by the Sheppard-Towner funds is the correspondence course for mothers. In this course mothers are trained through 12 regular lessons, including questions to be answered in writing and sent to the director for correction and additional information if needed. The course was written as simply as possible in order to reach even those who have poor educational background and who especially need instruction in maternal and infant care. It is given free to all mothers, fathers, and guardians of children. The course is in charge of a woman who is herself a nurse and a mother and has had many years' experience in training mothers through visiting nursing service.

During the two and one-half years this course has been in operation over 2,100 women have enrolled for instruction, and as a result of this teaching many of them have been induced to consult a physician rather than a midwife during the early months of pregnancy.

We all realize that without the Federal aid through the Sheppard-Towner fund it would have been impossible to accomplish what has been accomplished in maternity and infancy work in Virginia through the activities of its field workers and instructors.

According to your request I am inclosing some expressions of appreciation from those who have taken the correspondence course for mothers.

Very sincerely yours,

MARY EVELYN BEYDON, Director, Bureau Child Welfare.

WASHINGTON

STATE OF WASHINGTON, DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH,
Seattle, March 29, 1926.

HON. MORRIS SHEPPARD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: No money was available in this State for maternity and infancy work before the Sheppard-Towner Act became effective, and although several of the larger cities were carrying on some form of child-health activity, nothing on a state-wide basis had been done.

Through the avenues of child-health conferences, mother and baby health schools, and a correspondence course in the hygiene of maternity and infancy there is now available to the mothers of this State knowledge she should have relative to her own care during pregnancy and information regarding the care of her baby.

Physicians, public-health nurses, women's clubs, and other lay organizations have become keenly interested in these activities and the success of the State's program is due mainly to the cooperative efforts of these individuals and organizations.

One of the greatest assets which the division boasts is the deep interest in and the splendid attitude of the physicians throughout the State toward its child-hygiene program.

The death rate per 1,000 live births for infants under 1 year in this State has decreased from 59.09 in 1922 to 55.2 in 1924. The tabulations for the year 1925 have not yet been completed.

Inclosed is a brief summary of the activities of the division for the year ending December 31, 1925.

Very truly yours,

ELLA S. ERIKSON,
Advisory Nurse.

SUMMARY OF ACTIVITIES OF CHILD HYGIENE DIVISION OF STATE OF WASHINGTON, DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH, 1925

The division has for its object the education of the mothers of the State regarding their own care during pregnancy and the care of the infant and young child, so that morbidity and mortality during pregnancy, confinement, and infancy may be reduced.

Through cooperation with all public-health, medical, and lay organizations now conducting state-wide child welfare programs, the division is attempting to correlate all child-welfare activities now being carried on in the State.

The avenues through which this program is being promulgated are—

(1) CHILD-HEALTH CONFERENCES

During the past year child-health conferences have been conducted in 63 different communities of the State. Four thousand, five hundred and thirty-six examinations of infants and small children were made in these conferences. In each instance the significance of the findings were explained to the mother, need of medical and dental care pointed out, diet and general care discussed and questions answered. The conferences were all held under the auspices of some lay group in the community and with the cooperation of representatives of the medical profession.

(2) MOTHER AND BABY HEALTH SCHOOLS

Mother and baby health schools featuring lectures and demonstrations in prenatal and infant care have been held in many communities. The health schools consist of series of lectures and demonstrations by physicians, nutrition specialists, nurses, and other experts in child care. Mothers have been very greatly interested and attendance at the lectures has been most satisfactory. The health school idea is adaptable to communities of all sizes, anywhere from two to six lectures being given. Demonstrations depend upon material and assistance available.

(3) CORRESPONDENCE COURSE

A correspondence course in the hygiene of maternity and infancy given by the division has been highly successful. The course has a wide range of application and is being undertaken by groups of mothers as well as by individuals. Physicians and nurses have utilized this course as a means of instructing mothers. At the present time 273 mothers are enrolled in this course.

(4) LITERATURE AND RECORD FORMS

Physical examination forms and instructions for conference conduct have been prepared. Ten thousand two hundred and sixty copies of literature on child-health conservation have been distributed. The greater part of this literature is supplied by the Children's Bureau of the United States Department of Labor.

(5) FILMS, SLIDES, AND POSTERS

Films, slides, and posters owned by the division have been utilized by both lay and professional groups in promoting their child-hygiene programs.

For 1926 expansion of activities into the counties where comparatively little work in child hygiene has been done is planned. The coming year should see interest in child and maternal health manifest itself in some form in every county in the State.

WEST VIRGINIA

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA, DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH, DIVISION OF CHILD HYGIENE AND PUBLIC HEALTH NURSING, PROMOTION OF THE WELFARE AND HYGIENE OF MATERNITY AND INFANCY,
Charleston, W. Va., March 11, 1926.

HON. MORRIS SHEPPARD,
Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR SHEPPARD: It is a great pleasure to give all information possible to you concerning what has been accomplished in our State through the passage of the Sheppard-Towner Act.

Previous to the passage of this act in 1919 the Legislature of West Virginia created a division of child hygiene and public-health nursing, but funds were so limited that the work of the division was greatly handicapped. When Federal funds became available to us in May, 1922, it made possible added personnel and increased activity in our maternal and child-health program.

We are financing in the State department now, through Federal funds, one-half the salary and travel expense of the division director, the salary and travel expense for one white field advisory nurse and one colored field advisory nurse, two clerical workers, one clerk and one field worker in the vital statistics division. The remainder of our funds is used to supplement the budget for the employment of public-health nurses in local territory as a stimulus and encouragement toward establishment of a permanent health-protection program for the county or community. In a number of instances the successful demonstration of the public-health nursing program over a period of one or two years has resulted in the establishment of a full-time health department. This, we believe, is fulfilling the ultimate objective you had in mind in your heroic fight for the passage of the Sheppard-Towner bill.

If through the demonstration made by means of Sheppard-Towner funds in behalf of health protection and promotion for mothers and little children, permanent health organizations result in local territories in most of the States, you will have made a tremendous contribution to the country; indeed, we feel you have already done so.

Our State department of health is now contributing from $600 to $1,500 toward a budget for the employment of a public-health nurse in 11 counties of our State.

Besides the active nursing program and the activities related to birth registration, we are carrying on what, for want of a better term, we call a motherhood correspondence course. The inclosed copy of an article on this phase of the work which has just been prepared for the quarterly bulletin will be of interest. We are also inclosing copies of excerpts from mothers' letters which constantly come in.

If we can give you any further information, it will be our pleasure to do so.

Sincerely yours,

Mrs. JEAN T. DILLON, Director.

STUDY OF MOTHERHOOD CORRESPONDENCE COURSE IN WEST VIRGINIA

One of the methods used in several States to reach expectant mothers and mothers of young children, with health education as one means of reducing the maternal and infant sickness and death rate, is a series of letters and literature, grouped for convenience of expression under the title "Motherhood Correspondence Course."

West Virginia has been making a modest effort along this line since July, 1922. The course consists in our State of a series of five prenatal letters sent at short intervals, and accompanied by other material such as may be secured through the Children's Bureau and our own department, supplementary to the letters. The letters emphasize the importance of medical supervision from the beginning of pregnancy, of suitable diet, exercise, proper clothing, etc., for the expectant mother for the safeguarding of her own comfort and health as a means toward giving her child a fair chance to be well born. During the first six months over 800 women enrolled for this information, and by the end of the first year the number had grown to 1,875; by the end of the second year the enrollment had increased to 3,031, and at present the number is approximately 6,000.

The clerical work entailed has grown very heavy, and it was decided to make a test in order to find out whether results obtained were really commensurate with expense involved.

A simple questionnaire was sent out to 2,000 of the mothers who had been enrolled for a period of two years or longer.

It is interesting to note in connection with the above that the death rate under 1 year is 4.8 per cent, while for the State as a whole the figure stands at 7 per cent.

WISCONSIN

WISCONSIN STATE BOARD OF HEALTH AND UNITED STATES

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR, CHILDREN'S BUREAU,

Madison, March 1, 1926.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am very glad indeed to submit a very short account of the work which has been carried on in Wisconsin under the Sheppard-Towner Act.

The bureau has established a prenatal letter service, through which one letter each month is sent out to every expectant mother whose name is sent to us, and their letters of appreciation have placed a distinct value upon this branch of our service. We quote a few of these letters, as follows:

"You can never know how much your wonderful letters and bulletins meant to me. . . . I wish more of the prospective mothers knew of the splendid help your department gives."

"Thank you for the helpful literature. . . . It has helped me so much, as I knew nothing about motherhood."

" . . . I find your letters of great help; thank you for interest and kindness."

"Thank you for the helpful service. I saved your letters and bulletins and reread them from time to time. Sincerely believe that I can nurse my third baby for a longer period than the other two because of your information. I am taking care of myself the way you told me to do. . . ."

"I feel that it is due to your letters that my second baby lived. The first one did not live many hours, and I realize now that it was because I knew nothing about caring for myself."

"Every mother in Wisconsin ought to have your letters, which have been a wonderful help to me. . . ."

"The letters tell me everything I wish to know."

We could quote many more on this subject, but as these come from various parts of the State, it will show somewhat the appreciation which our mothers have.

In addition, Wisconsin has been able, through the cooperation of the board of normal regents and the board of education, to incorporate our infant-hygiene classes in the seventh and eighth grades of almost every school in the State. The plan for this has been worked out by Mrs. Gertrude Hasbrouck, organizer of the infant-hygiene classes in the public schools of Wisconsin, and is meeting with very wonderful success.

We have sent the inclosed bulletins of the child-welfare special and the six-year summary to each one of our United States Senators and Representatives; also to each counselor of the State medical society, besides sending a number of these to our various women's clubs, including the League of Women Voters, with headquarters at Chicago.

If we can send you any further information, or if there are any suggestions you can make as to how we could better reach or interest more people in this work, we will be very glad to accept anything offered.

Sincerely yours,

CORA S. ALLEN, M. D.,
Acting Director Bureau of Child Welfare.

WYOMING

THE STATE OF WYOMING,
DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC HEALTH,
Cheyenne, March 29, 1926.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,

Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SHEPPARD: I am inclosing a summary of the work done during 1925 in the State division of child hygiene in cooperation with the Children's Bureau, of Washington, D. C., under the Sheppard-Towner Act.

Our work has consisted of itinerant mother and child health conferences. At these conferences babies and children were examined by the local physician in the community in which the conferences were held. Defects were pointed out and advice was given. In all cases the baby or child was referred to its family physician. We furnish neither medicine nor prescriptions.

The mothers were instructed as to prenatal care, natal care, infant feeding, and child care. We also conducted permanent health conferences or centers. The field nurses also made home visits. This work consisted of instructing the mother in prenatal care and also in child care. Home visits were also made to see if any suggestions made at the conferences had been followed out.

There was also organized mothers' circles or groups, in which instruction in prenatal care was given.

There were 1,484 prenatal visits made, 6,615 children visited; there were 50 itinerant child and mother's health conferences held, at which 1,196 children were examined. There were 66 permanent health conferences conducted, at which 1,329 children were examined. There were 197 prenatal conferences conducted, at which there were 1,337 mothers in attendance. At the prenatal conference the mothers were instructed and demonstrations were made, but there were no physical examinations made.

Considering the great distances in Wyoming and the sparseness of the population the task of conducting these conferences and making these visits is considerable. We are sorry that we can not make a better showing, but I believe our work will compare reasonably well with other States when these factors are taken into consideration.

Very truly yours,

G. M. ANDERSON, M. D.,
State Health Officer.

CLAIMS AGAINST THE GERMAN GOVERNMENT

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a few days ago I offered a number of resolutions, three of which I desire to have taken up to-day.

One of those resolutions is Senate Resolution 198, calling upon the Secretary of State to transmit to the Senate certain information, if not incompatible with the public interest. I have submitted it to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and he has no objection to it. I shall have it read if Senators desire.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to his colleague?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. Do I understand that this is agreed to and will lead to no debate?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. In that case I have no objection to its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider Senate Resolution 198, submitted by Mr. KING on the 10th instant, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State transmit to the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, copies of all correspondence, notes, exchanges, and communications which have passed directly or indirectly between the Secretary of State and the Government of Germany respecting the settlement and payment of claims against the German Government for indemnification on account of destruction of life and property of American nationals subsequent to August 1, 1914, including the instructions given to Ambassador Kellogg, who represented the Department of State at the Paris Finance Conference, and also advise the Senate as to whether the State Department at the Paris conference, or otherwise, agreed that the United States should assume the burden of the payment of awards made in favor of American nationals against Germany and accept from Germany, in subrogation of the rights of its own nationals, annual installments of $11,000,000 for the payment of private American awards and annual installments of $12,000,000 in reimbursement of the costs of the American Army of Occupation of the Coblenz area on the Rhine and in payment of other Government claims, as representing the entire obligation of the German Government to the Government of the United States in the premises, and if the Secretary made such an agreement, to advise the Senate of the considerations which induced him to make the same.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, has the Senator taken up the resolution with the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations?

Mr. KING. I submitted this resolution, as well as the companion one asking the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish similar information if he had any, to the chairman of the committee; and he advised me that it is all right, that he has no objection to it.

Mr. CURTIS. I have no objection.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand that the Secretary has no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the companion resolution calls upon the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish the correspondence which he may have had respecting the same matters mentioned in the resolution just passed. That resolution is numbered 199; and I ask to have it considered and acted upon at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read Senate Resolution 199, submitted by Mr. KING on the 10th instant, and it was considered and agreed to by the Senate, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury transmit to the Senate all correspondence, notes, exchanges, and communications which have passed directly or indirectly between the Secretary of the Treasury and representatives of the German Government respecting the settlement and payment of American claims against Germany, together with a statement concerning all conferences and negotiations on the subject of such claims, to which he directly or indirectly has been a party, and to advise the Senate whether representatives of the Department of the Treasury, with his authorization, have carried on negotiations in Germany respecting the settlement and payment of such claims, and to report to the Senate any and all arrangements, recommendations, or agreements, which he has made in the premises, and the considerations which induced him to make the same.

PROPOSED PHILIPPINE MISSION

Mr. KING. I also ask unanimous consent to take up Senate Resolution 196 and have it acted upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read Senate Resolution 196, submitted by Mr. KING on the 9th instant, as follows:

Whereas it is reported that Carmel Thompson, Esq., of Ohio, has been appointed by the President, without authority of Congress and without the advice and consent of the Senate, to go to the Philippine Islands, accompanied by a staff and retinue of experts, investigators, and clerks, to make an investigation of conditions in the Philippine Islands and of the affairs of the Philippine Government and to report to the President upon the policy of the United States as affecting the political independence of the Philippine Islands; and

Whereas it is the exclusive function of Congress, under the Constitution, to determine the policy of the United States with respect to the Philippine Islands, and to make such investigations and visitations as it may deem advisable of the Territories and dependencies of the United States; and

Whereas Congress has made no provision for the payment of the expenditures of said Thompson and of his staff: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury advise the Senate as to whether or not any funds in the Treasury are available for the payment of the expenses of said Thompson and his staff under any existing appropriation act; and if not, what funds of the Government are to be advanced or made available for the use of said Thompson and his staff in the premises?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, if the Senator will eliminate the whereases, I have no objection to the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. KING. I shall defer to the wishes of my good friend, and the whereases may be stricken from the resolution as adopted.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. With the whereases eliminated, the question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. KING. Of course, the whereases will appear in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the preamble will be stricken out.

Mr. KING. Of course, the preamble will appear in the RECORD of to-day's proceedings.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was read and will appear in the RECORD.

Mr. KING. As striking out the preamble necessitates a change in the resolution, I submit it in an amended form and ask for its adoption.

The resolution in its amended form was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury advise the Senate as to whether or not any funds in the Treasury are available under any existing appropriation act for the payment of the expenses of an investigation of conditions in the Philippine Islands by Carmel Thompson, Esq., of Ohio, recently reported to have been appointed by the President of the United States to make such investigation, and his staff; and if no funds are available, what funds of the Government are to be advanced or made available for the use of said Thompson and his staff in the premises.

AMERICAN LEGION MUSEUM

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, on yesterday I objected to the consideration of a joint resolution of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON]. He had to go away this morning, and I told him that I would call up the joint resolution and withdraw my objection. It is important to him; and I request that the joint resolution be taken up at this time and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the joint resolution.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 91) directing the Secretary of War to allot war trophies to the American Legion Museum, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be directed to allot and deliver without cost to the United States, to the National Museum of the American Legion at its national headquarters, a representative collection of captured and surrendered war devices and trophies of the World War, to be selected from those war devices and trophies not otherwise allotted and accepted for distribution in accordance with law: Provided, That acceptance, shipment, and delivery shall be made within a reasonable time and under the laws and regulations, except as herein provided, that are now applicable to acceptance, shipment, and delivery of war devices and trophies to the States, Territories, possessions of the United States, and the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLEASE. It is just a little local matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE CALENDAR

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I had intended at this time to ask for a unanimous-consent agreement to vote upon the Italian debt settlement bill. I have been informed that the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] is engaged at some of the departments, and that it will be about 3 o'clock before he returns, and that he desires to be here when a unanimous-consent agreement on this subject is submitted. Of course, I shall respect that request. I now ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside until 3 o'clock, and that we take up the calendar under Rule VIII and consider bills to which there is no objection until that time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Beginning where, Mr. President?

Mr. SMOOT. Beginning where we left off the last time.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; we got through with the calendar the other day. Why not begin with the calendar under Rule VIII, and, if there is an objection, take up the bill under Rule VIII?

Personally, I have no objection to the Senator's request, though I know that several Senators would prefer the course I have suggested. However, I will make no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Utah is agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I now ask that Orders of Business 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and 30, being Senate bills 1134, 1135, 1136, 1137, 1138, and 1139, and House bill 6559, be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Those measures will be passed over. The Secretary will state the next bill on the calendar.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum having been suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Ferris	McKellar	Shipstead
Bayard	Fess	McKinley	Shortridge
Bingham	Fletcher	McLean	Simmons
Bleuse	Frazier	McMaster	Smith
Bornh	George	McNary	Smoot
Bratton	Gerry	Mayfield	Stanfield
Broussard	Gillett	Metcalf	Stephens
Bruce	Goff	Moses	Swanson
Cameron	Hale	Neely	Trammell
Capper	Harreld	Norbeck	Tyson
Caraway	Harris	Nye	Wadsworth
Copeland	Harrison	Oddie	Walsh
Couzens	Heflin	Overman	Warren
Cummins	Howell	Phipps	Watson
Curtis	Johnson	Pine	Weller
Dale	Jones, N. Mex.	Pittman	Wheeler
Deneen	Jones, Wash.	Ransdell	Williams
Dill	Kendrick	Reed, Pa.	Willis
Edge	Keyes	Robinson, Ark.
Ernst	King	Sackett
Fernald	Lenroot	Sheppard

Mr. PHIPPS. My colleague [Mr. MEANS] is absent on account of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-one Senators having responded, a quorum is present. The clerk will call the next number on the calendar.

The bill (S. 1824) for the relief of R. E. Swartz, W. J. Collier, and others, was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

REFUND OF TAXES

The bill (S. 2526) to extend the time for the refunding of taxes erroneously collected from certain estates was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the Senator from Missouri, I should like an explanation from the Senator as to what the effect of the bill would be, and what amount would probably be required to be paid from the Treasury to meet the claims which would be presented under this bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is the purpose of the bill to extend the statute of limitations so as to cover this particular claim. About 95 per cent of these claims have already been paid. The reason the statute of limitations expired as to this claim was that a case was pending in the Supreme Court of the United States testing out the question, and during that test period, and before the Supreme Court had decided in favor of the contesting claimants, the statute of limitations was about to expire as to these claims. About 95 per cent of the claims have already been paid, and the report of the department shows that the claim ought to be paid. The only objection is that it ought to be covered by general legislation. By the same token, however, there are a great many individual claims which ought to be covered by general legislation to which such claims could be referable. I am satisfied of the propriety and the legality of the claim.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The question that is raised by this bill is exactly the same question we were confronted with in two or three cases in the enactment of the tax bill which passed earlier in the session. In some of those cases the Senate declined to put in provisions similar to this, to allow persons to come in and bring suits for refunds who had slept on their rights until somebody else had succeeded in getting a favorable decision. I think the Senate ought to stop and consider whether it is wise to do this in particular cases of this sort, and not wipe out the whole statute of limitations in the tax bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I quite agree with the Senator from Pennsylvania that a serious question is raised by a bill like this; but I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania a question—that is, when the Government of the United States obtains possession of money which does not belong to it, but does belong to an individual citizen of the United States, should it be permitted to keep that money?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. If it is not to be permitted to keep the money, then we ought to repeal all statutes of limitation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think the circumstances of this particular case make it one which is entitled to consideration, if any are to be considered.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I do not believe we ought to act on particular matters of this sort without determining the general policy. At any rate, I think the bill had better go over for further consideration.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It has gone over so frequently I am very fearful that if it continues to go over we will never get any action either in this or in the other body. Bills similar to it were passed in the Sixty-sixth, the Sixty-seventh, and the Sixty-eighth Congresses.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Provisions similar to it were stricken out of the tax bill which we passed earlier in the session.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The statute of limitations has been extended as to claims in like cases to enable the parties to bring claims of this kind to the only place where they can get relief.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I know that; and yet there are dozens of other cases just as meritorious.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over, under the rule.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2336) to reimburse Commander Walter H. Allen, civil engineer, United States Navy, for losses sustained while carrying out his duties was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1859) for the relief of Patrick C. Wilkes, alias Clebourn P. Wilkes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

DEPENDENT CHILDREN IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The bill (S. 1929) to provide home care for dependent children in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that instead of proceeding to the consideration of this bill we consider House bill 7669, which is Order of Business No. 495. The House bill deals with exactly the same subject, and it would save time if we were to deal with the House bill on the calendar rather than the Senate bill.

Mr. KING. Is there any difference between the bills?

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is no difference in the object to be achieved by the bills, if the Senator will permit me just a moment, but the House bill has been amended by the Committee on the District of Columbia to make it conform with the Senate bill.

Mr. LENROOT. The recommendations of the committee are the same in both cases?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The report of the committee is the same as to both bills.

Mr. KING. Let me see if I understand the Senator. The House passed a bill known as the Wadsworth bill?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; the Keller bill. It is a bill in which I have been interested, but it is Mr. KELLER's bill.

Mr. KING. Textually it is the same as the bill introduced by the Senator from New York?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; practically.

Mr. KING. The Senate committee has reported out a bill desired by the people of the District of Columbia and known as the Capper bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senate committee has reported the so-called Capper bill, and now has reported the Keller bill, amended to conform in its objective with the Senate bill.

Mr. COUZENS. What are the differences between the bill as originally passed by the House and as amended by the Senate committee?

Mr. KING. It is apparent that this bill will lead to considerable discussion—

Mr. WADSWORTH. I hope an objection will not be raised. I think the discussion may take place under the five-minute rule.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Maryland, if he desires to ask a question.

Mr. BRUCE. I have just come into the Chamber, and I simply wanted to say to the Senator from New York that if this matter involves a discussion of that special board which I understand to be treated by the bill of the Senator, I am very strongly opposed to the passage of the bill, and I would like to have an opportunity not only to discuss it but to discuss it most fully.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator, then, intend to object to the consideration of the proposed legislation during this call of the calendar?

Mr. BRUCE. I do not care to do so, but I am bound to object.

HENRY T. WILCOX

The bill (S. 1747) for the relief of the estate of Henry T. Wilcox, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall not object to this bill, but with my present information I shall feel constrained to vote against it, because I think it would set a very bad precedent. I shall ask the Senator to explain it.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I appreciate the courtesy of the Senator from Utah in withholding his objection. This bill, as can be seen by the report submitted by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL], cuts down a claim of $18,559, made by Henry T. Wilcox, in the Consular Service of the United States, to $5,000, covering the full claim. The circumstances are, briefly, these:

Consul Wilcox during the war was ordered, on very short notice, to go to France. His household goods were taken over in a United States transport, as was frequently done and has been the custom for many, many years. A large proportion of those household effects were lost. They were valued, as I indicated, at over $18,000. The officials of the State Department and other officials, as appears in the report, have all, without qualification, indorsed the claim. The Committee on Claims, however, after considering all the facts, decided to cut the figures from $18,000 to $5,000, which is less than one-third of the original claim. Upon the report of the committee I ask favorable action.

It does not seem to me that this would set a precedent. Such claims have been paid many times in cases of Government officials ordered on duty by the Government, and who had the privilege of using transports for the carriage of their furniture. In cases where the furniture has been lost or destroyed reimbursement has regularly been permitted. I recall that last year I introduced a bill to reimburse Admiral Jayne, whose goods were lost in circumstances exactly like those in this case.

The Senate passed it because there seemed to be no real fair reason why Admiral Jayne personally should suffer the loss. That is all the bill proposes to do in the present instance.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall vote against the passage of the bill. I think it is a very unwise precedent, or, if it is not a precedent, it is a very unwise policy for the Government to adopt. There are hundreds of officers and officials and agents of the United States gallivanting around the United States and throughout the world. We have terrestrial peregrinations by hundreds of Government officials and officers and agents. If they may embark upon ships and boats and railroads with their household effects of the value of $20,000 or $30,000—the claimant asks $18,000 in this case—and the Government be responsible for losses, for thefts, for the negligence, if there be negligence, upon the part of those transporting the same, then it seems to me we are introducing a very dangerous practice into the policies and administration of the Government.

Mr. EDGE rose.

Mr. KING. I anticipate what the Senator is about to say, and it does not change the rule because the Government orders a man who is in the Consular Service to go to a given point. Senators are ordered to come to Washington when the President convenes us. If a Senator were to send here $20,000 worth of furniture and it was lost by the railroads, should the Government be called upon to pay for it? So, manifestly, officials who go abroad under orders, being in the service of the Government, under the civil service, perhaps, taking household goods and jewels and property of great value, should not, if the ship sinks or theft occurs, call upon the Government to pay for the loss.

A prudent man would have his goods insured, and it is no excuse to say, "I was on a Government boat." The property carried upon Government boats is usually insured. Insurance companies are for that purpose. If individuals ship abroad $20,000 or $30,000 worth of furniture, I submit that the Government ought not to be called upon to meet the obligation in the event of theft or loss.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I concede there is some justification for the opinion expressed by the Senator. I do not believe, however, that the officials should be the ones to suffer. I think the practice should be discontinued. The State Department is empowered to order him to go, and arranges the specific transportation, and his furniture naturally has to go with him. If it is a bad practice, and that is a debatable question, then instructions should go from the Congress to the heads of the Departments of State and War that they should not issue such orders.

Mr. KING. If I should take an examination and be made a consul and I should be ordered from place to place, does the Senator believe that I should understand that the Government was to be responsible for the furniture which I took with me? Many consuls take no furniture with them. The great majority of them take none. If rich men are appointed as ambassadors or ministers or consuls and elect to take their furniture from the United States, then they take the same at their own risk. The Government, I think, is too generous in permitting them to take it and not to pay freight for having the same carried, but theirs is the risk, and it is unjust to the Government to ask it to assume the risk.

Mr. EDGE. That has been the practice for many years, and just why this particular consul should in any way be punished would be rather inconsistent.

Mr. KING. I might add that if it is a just rule, then the man ought to be paid for his furniture even if it cost him $100,000.

Mr. EDGE. I think he should; but in this case he will take what the committee allowed.

Mr. KING. Manifestly the committee did not find it was just, but as a sop to him, in violation, it seems to me, of every principle of justice, they gave him $5,000. We have to consider these things as custodians of the public funds. We represent the public and not a mere official.

The bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 7, to strike "$18,559" and insert in lieu thereof "$5,000," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the estate of Henry T. Wilcox, American consul, Paris, France, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000, for loss and damage to household effects while in transit to Brest, France, and Antwerp, Belgium, on board United States transports Antigone and Mercury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment, on page 2, line 11, after the word "company" to strike out the following proviso: "Provided further, That the said railroad company shall pay the District of Columbia for the lighting of the viaduct under which the tracks of the said railroad company will pass, in accordance with the provisions of existing law," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to construct a viaduct and approaches to carry Michigan Avenue over the tracks and right of way of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. in accordance with plans and profiles of said works, to be approved by the said commissioners: Provided, That one-half of the total cost of constructing the said viaduct and approaches shall be borne and paid by the said railroad company, its successors and assigns, to the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia, to the credit of the District of Columbia, and the same shall be a valid and subsisting lien against the franchises and property of the said railroad company and shall constitute a legal indebtedness of said company in favor of the District of Columbia, and the said lien may be enforced in the name of the District of Columbia by a bill in equity brought by the said commissioners in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, or by any other lawful proceeding against the said railroad company.

Y., on or about the 24th day of February, 1916, may be sued for by the said owners of the ferryboat Oregon in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York sitting as a court of admiralty and acting under the rules governing such court, and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such suit and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such damages and costs, if any, as shall be found to be due against the United States in favor of the owners of the said ferryboat Oregon, or against the owners of the said ferryboat Oregon, in favor of the United States, upon the same principles and measures of liability as in like cases in admiralty between private parties and with the same rights of appeal: Provided, That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by order of the said court, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause the United States attorney in such district to appear and defend for the United States: Provided further, That said suit shall be brought and commenced within four months from the date of the passage of this act.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Missouri [Mr. WILLIAMS] whether this is the bill to which his attention was called a few days ago and whether he has any amendment to offer to it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have no amendment to offer. The only suggestion I have to offer with reference to the bill is that the War Department contends that the accident was unavoidable on the part of the Government steamer.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMERICAN STEAM TUG W. S. HOLBROOK

The bill (S. 116) for the relief of the owners and/or receiver of the American steam tug W. S. Holbrook was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM WOOSTER

The bill (S. 465) for the relief of William Wooster was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to William Wooster, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,806.53, for the payment in full of the claim of the said William Wooster, of Holbrook, Ariz., under a certain transportation contract of April 17, 1905, between the said William Wooster and the United States, for losses sustained by the said Wooster by reason of the negligence of the Government in the failure to deliver the goods for shipment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I would like to have an explanation of the bill from the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. CAMERON. A similar bill has passed the Senate and the House at various times. The man William Wooster had a contract with the Government of the United States to deliver a certain amount of tonnage of goods in August and September at Holbrook, Ariz., to be transported to Fort Apache.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator tell me the branch of the Government with whom the contract was made and whether the contract was in writing?

Mr. CAMERON. The contract was with the Quartermaster General's Department for the hauling of supplies for the troops at Fort Apache. As the Senator probably knows, the contract was let at 92 cents per 100 pounds, but the Government did not deliver the goods until wintertime, and it cost Mr. Wooster, the contractor, something over $2 per hundred pounds to deliver the goods. He lost in the transaction, according to the statement of the War Department, over $6,000. We have been trying for a number of years to get the bill passed. It has passed the House on one or two occasions, but did not then pass the Senate. It passed the Senate last session, but did not pass the House. I think it is about time that the Government should pay Mr. Wooster the small amount of money which is carried by the bill, being only $1,800, when as a matter of fact his loss was almost $7,000 and occurred away back in 1895.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. CAMERON. Gladly.

Mr. KING. Was there any limitation as to the time within which the goods were to be delivered to him for hauling?

Mr. CAMERON. Yes; they were to be delivered to him in August and September. There is a long report from the War Department. They recommend payment of the claim, but say they have not the money with which to pay it and that the only way he can be paid is for the Congress to appropriate the money.

Mr. KING. There was a breach of contract upon the part of the War Department?

Mr. CAMERON. Absolutely.

Mr. KING. It employed this man to haul certain merchandise at a certain time and then failed to deliver the merchandise at that time, but months later delivered the merchandise, and at the time they did deliver it the weather conditions were such that it made the transportation very much more costly than if it had been transported in August and September at the time the contract provided. Are those the facts?

Mr. CAMERON. Yes; those are the actual facts.

Mr. KING. I have no objection to the passage of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HENRY A. KESSEL CO. (INC.)

The bill (S. 2848) to extend the time for institution of proceedings authorized under private law No. 81, Sixty-eighth Congress, being an act for the relief of Henry A. Kessel Co. (Inc.), was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an extension of not more than four months from the date of the passage of this bill, for the time for institution of the proceedings authorized under private law 81, Sixty-eighth Congress, being an act for the relief of Henry A. Kessel Co. (Inc.), be, and is hereby, authorized.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CREDITS ALLOWED CERTAIN GOVERNMENT CONTRACTORS

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 47) authorizing the Comptroller General of the United States to allow credit to contractors for payments received from either Army or Navy disbursing officers in settlement of contracts entered into with the United States during the period from April 6, 1917, to November 11, 1918, was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the General Accounting Office is hereby authorized in the discretion of the Comptroller General of the United States to allow credit to contractors for payments received from either Army or Navy disbursing officers in settlement of contracts entered into with the United States during the period from April 6, 1917, to November 11, 1918, and where said payments have been credited in the accounts of the respective disbursing officers pursuant to the provisions of an act entitled "An act authorizing the Comptroller General of the United States to allow credits to and relieve certain disbursing officers of the War and Navy Departments in the settlement of certain accounts," approved April 21, 1922 (42 Stat. L. p. 497), as extended by the act approved February 11, 1925 (43 Stat. L. p. 8607).

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] make an explanation of the joint resolution?

Mr. McLEAN. When we declared war, the War Department found itself in need of large quantities of Cavalry equipment—harness, saddles, and so forth. The War Department made contracts with the manufacturers, but shortly after some of the contracts were entered into the organized leather workers demanded a raise in wages. A commission was appointed to settle the question as to raise of pay or change in wage scale. An adjustment was made. Senators will find a copy of the adjustment printed on pages 1 and 2 of the report. Paragraph 5 of the adjustment reads as follows:

In the event that any changes in wage scale are made or approved by the commission—

That is, the commission appointed to adjust the matter—

In carrying out its functions under this agreement, compensatory adjustments shall be made by the United States in accordance with the recommendations of the commission.

This adjustment was printed in some contracts and in some of them it was not. Some of them were entered into before the demand for the increase in wages was made. The department settled the claims in accordance with this provision. These claimants already have their money. The bill merely provides that they shall keep it. It is declared by the Comptroller General, Mr. McCarl—in fact, he is the author of the bill—that, as all of these contractors are precisely on the same basis, there seems to be no possible reason why they should not be treated alike.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, what amount is involved?

Mr. McLEAN. About $15,000. They already have their money; but the Comptroller General says that unless this bill shall be passed he will have to start some proceedings to get it back. He thinks, however, that they ought to keep the money, and he approves of this bill.

Mr. KING. The bill does not relate to any cases in future?

Mr. McLEAN. No; the cases are all stated in the report.

Mr. KING. It simply legalizes illegal payments which have heretofore been made?

Mr. McLEAN. I do not agree with the Senator with regard to that.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Neil, of Ogden, Utah, the sum of $7,947.53 as compensation for and in full satisfaction of any claim such J. W. Neil may have for losses suffered by reason of the libel of a carload of sugar belonging to him on May 21, 1920, by a United States marshal under color of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917, as amended.

Peck $230.50 in full satisfaction of all claims for damages sustained on January 20, 1921, through the loss of two horses and two packsaddles while in the use of the National Park Service at Grand Canyon National Park.

JOSEPH B. TANNER

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 467) for the relief of Joseph B. Tanner, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment on page 1, line 3, to strike out the words "That the sum of $250 be paid to Joseph B. Tanner, of Shiprock, N. Mex.," and to insert "That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Joseph B. Tanner, of Shiprock, N. Mex., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $250," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Joseph B. Tanner, of Shiprock, N. Mex., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $250, for reimbursement of the amount forfeited by him for nondelivery at the Navajo Springs Indian Agency, Colo., of 385 head of 2-year-old heifers of Hereford blood, and 15 bulls not less than three-fourths Hereford blood, 2-year-olds and 3-year-olds, the sum in question having been deposited by him in the form of a certified check guaranteeing the performance of his contract to deliver these animals, which check was forfeited to the Government on account of his failure to make delivery under his agreement through a misunderstanding of the true meaning and intent of his contract as between the said Tanner and the inspecting official representing the Government.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. KING. Let that bill be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. KING. I should like an explanation of the bill, Mr. President; otherwise I shall ask that it go over.

Mr. CAPPER. I ask that the bill may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

The bill (S. 769) for the relief of the estate of Benjamin Braznell was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

ELIZABETH B. EDDY

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 102) to carry into effect the finding of the Court of Claims in the claim of Elizabeth B. Eddy. It proposes to pay to Elizabeth B. Eddy, widow of Charles G. Eddy, of New York, N. Y., $602.92.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANNIE H. MARTIN

Martin, of Carson City, Nev., $545.02 to enable her to make payment of a liability incurred by her as acting assayer in charge, United States Mint, Carson City, Nev., for losses in operating on bullion.

HUNTER-BROWN CO.

The bill (S. 1304) for the relief of Hunter-Brown Co. was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

WILLIAM HENSLEY

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1451) for the relief of William Hensley. It proposes to pay to William Hensley $1,500, in full payment for injuries sustained by him while in the discharge of his duties at the navy yard, Washington, resulting in the loss of three fingers of his right hand, loss of his left eye, and other injuries incurred by him in the line of duty.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I merely wish to ask one question. Why does not Mr. Hensley receive compensation under the general compensation act instead of it being proposed that he shall receive it through a special bill?

Mr. CAPPER. He does not seem to be entitled to compensation under the general compensation act; but the Secretary of the Navy seems to report favorably on the bill. Similar bills have received several favorable reports in Congress and have been passed by the Senate several times.

Mr. KING. I was not objecting, but I was wondering why application was not made for relief under the general compensation law.

Mr. CAPPER. I am unable to give the Senator further information on the subject. It is a worthy claim, and I think it ought to be passed. As I have stated, it has heretofore passed the Senate a number of times.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES E. FITZGERALD

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2200) for the relief of James B. Fitzgerald, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment in line 5, before the name "Fitzgerald," to strike out the initial "E" and to insert "B," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the United States Employees' Compensation Commission shall be, and it is hereby, authorized to extend to James B. Fitzgerald, a former employee in the Postal Service, the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes," approved September 7, 1916, compensation hereunder to commence from and after the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am unfamiliar with the bill, but I see in the report of the committee this statement, which is taken from a previous report on the bill:

The Post Office Department reports that Mr. Fitzgerald "was not entitled to benefit under the act of March 9, 1914, by reason of the fact that he was not in the absolute performance of his official duties when the accident occurred."

I shall have to ask that the bill go over. If Mr. Fitzgerald was not performing his official duties when the accident occurred, then, of course, he was not entitled to compensation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill goes over on objection.

MARK J. WHITE

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2242) for the relief of Mark J. White. It proposes to pay to Mark J. White, an officer of the United States Public Health Service, Treasury Department, $163.75, representing a judgment for costs assessed against him by the Supreme Court of the United States on December 10, 1923, in case No. 172, October term, 1923, growing out of the case of William Leather et al. against White et al. for the recovery of certain real estate in the custody of the said Mark J. White as an official of the United States.

Mr. KING. Let us have an explanation of the bill or let the report be read.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, this is a bill which was sent to the Committee on Claims by the Secretary of the Treasury. It has been submitted to the Bureau of the Budget. It is a worthy measure, and grows out of the case of William Leather et al. against White et al. for the recovery of certain real estate in the custody of White as an official of the United States.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in a letter to the committee under date of January 3, 1925, in regard to this case, says:

The necessity for this item of legislation arises by reason of the fact that Dr. Mark J. White, now an assistant surgeon general of the Public Health Service and formerly in charge of the hospital of that service at Maywood, Ill., was made a defendant in the legal action brought by the plaintiffs in the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois, eastern division, on June 24, 1921, for the purpose of recovering possession of the hospital property then under the official custody of this office.

Doctor White was represented by official counsel, and it is the understanding of this department that at some stage in the proceeding an appeal on a jurisdictional point was taken by the Government from the district court to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Seventh District and finally to the Supreme Court of the United States. The decision of this latter court under date of December 10, 1922, was unfavorable to the contention of the Government, and by its mandate of that date costs were assessed against the defendant.

Doctor White had no personal interest in the case whatever; it was a Government case, and now the Secretary of the Treasury asks that he may be reimbursed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE ROYAL HOLLAND LLOYD

The bill (S. 2962) for the relief of the Royal Holland Lloyd, a Netherlands corporation of Amsterdam, the Netherlands, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] a question as to the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not familiar with the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over under the rule.

REMISSION OR DEDUCTIONS OR FINES UPON MAIL CONTRACTORS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3429) authorizing the Postmaster General to remit or change deductions or fines imposed upon contractors for mail service, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 266 of the act of June 8, 1872, chapter 335 (17 Stat. p. 315), Revised Statutes 3962, is amended to read as follows:

"The Postmaster General may make deductions from the pay of contractors for failures to perform service according to contract and impose fines upon them for other delinquencies (which deductions or fines may be changed or remitted in his discretion). He may deduct the price of the trip in all cases where the trip is not performed, and not exceeding three times the price if the failure be occasioned by the fault of the contractor or carrier."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Hampshire briefly explain this bill and state how much will be involved?

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, it would be impossible to say how much will be involved, but this bill arises out of the peculiar conditions which have grown up in the mail service, particularly in the State of Florida, where the increase in the bulk of the mails is such that the contractors who are carrying on what is now known as the screened wagon service, with which, of course, the Senator from Utah is familiar, and certain of the star-route contractors find themselves absolutely unable to perform the service which the increase in the volume of the mail demands, and in consequence of that they have in many cases been compelled to default in the service, greatly to the detriment of the progress of the mails. This measure is designed to give the Postmaster General authority to inquire into conditions which may arise in like circumstances.

I will say to the Senator from Utah that under the terms of this bill the authorization to the Postmaster General to inquire into these contracts and readjust them will not demand any added appropriation of public money. The cost, whatever it may be, can readily be cared for out of the appropriations already made, so that it entails neither an increase in the estimates nor an increase in the appropriations.

Mr. KING. I have no objection to the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ST. JOSEPH'S MALE ORPHAN ASYLUM, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3012) to change the name of "The Trustees of St. Joseph's Male Orphan Asylum" and amend the act incorporating the same, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of Congress incorporating "The Trustees of St. Joseph's Male Orphan Asylum," approved on the 6th day of February, in the year 1855, be, and it hereby is, amended as follows:

"The name of said corporation shall be St. Joseph's Home and School.

"SEC. 5. Sections 3 and 4 of said act of Congress approved on the 6th day of February, 1855, and all parts of said act inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

"SEC. 6. The right is reserved to alter, amend, or repeal this act."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HARRY ROSS HUBBARD

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 869) for the relief of Harry Ross Hubbard. It directs the Comptroller General of the United States to credit the accounts of Harry Ross Hubbard, Lieutenant (junior grade), United States Navy, with $942.25, disallowed in item 5 of statement of differences, certificate No. N-1379-E, dated May 6, 1922.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 945) for the relief of Gershon Bros. Co. was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask that that bill may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over under the rule.

The bill (S. 2981) to amend section 553 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over under the rule.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS

The bill (S. 3300) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the war with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, or the China relief expedition to certain widows, minor children, and helpless children of such soldiers and sailors, and for other purposes was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, in view of the fact that a certain bill to which I shall call attention in a moment was to have been taken up yesterday morning and again this morning if we had had an opportunity to proceed with the consideration of the calendar, that we now take it up out of order.

Mr. MOSES. What is the bill?

Mr. KING. It is a bill relating to the height of buildings in the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will ask if objection was made to Senate bill 3300.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I will object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over under the rule.

Mr. MOSES. Wait a moment, Mr. President. To what bill is the Senator from South Dakota objecting?

Mr. NORBECK. I was objecting to the request presented by the Senator from Utah [Mr. King].

Mr. MOSES. The Senator is not objecting to the consideration of Order of Business No. 287, being Senate bill 3300?

Mr. NORBECK. No.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of Senate bill 3300?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, was the bill passed by the House?

Mr. MOSES. This is the Senate bill.

Mr. SMITH. Is not this the identical bill that passed the House—House bill 8132?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is unable to inform the Senator.

Mr. SMITH. My impression is that it is. If that be the case, that bill passed the House without a dissenting vote; and if the bills are identical we could substitute the House bill for the Senate bill and expedite the whole matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator make that suggestion?

Mr. SMITH. I should like to know from the chairman of the committee whether or not these bills are identical.

Mr. NORBECK. They are identical, and they are both on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that they are identical.

Mr. SMITH. Then I move to substitute the House bill for the Senate bill, and let us vote upon that.

Mr. KING. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, House bill 8132 will be read.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 8132) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the war with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, or the China relief expedition, to certain maimed soldiers, to certain widows, minor children, and helpless children of such soldiers and sailors, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Pensions, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. KING. I ask to have the bill read textually, please.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill as proposed to be amended.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, are we actually considering this bill now? I thought we were substituting the House bill for the Senate bill.

Mr. SMITH. This is the House bill, which we have substituted for the Senate bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Then we have already substituted it for the Senate bill?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Then the House bill is before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The House bill is before the Senate; the amendment is being read, and the question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I desire to be assured by the chairman of the Senate committee that this substituted bill, coming to us from the House, is in harmony with and the same as the Senate bill which has been reported to the Senate.

Mr. NORBECK. It is exactly the same, keeping in mind the fact that the Senate bill was amended in the Senate committee. When the House bill came over, similar amendments were made to it. I desire to state further that there were no material changes in the rates from those fixed by the House; but the retroactive features were struck out, and a good many things were eliminated that will reduce the cost considerably from the cost under the House bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the House bill is substituted for the Senate bill then there is just one amendment, and it will all be agreed to at one time; will it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is true. The question is on agreeing to the Senate committee amendment to the House bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I understood that a request was made to read the House bill as it would read if the amendment were adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. SMOOT. Only part of it has been read. The Secretary stopped reading at the word "pensioners" in line 8, page 2, of the Senate bill. They are identical as far as the Secretary read, but he has not read any further than that.

Mr. SMITH. As I understood, the request was that the text of the bill be read. Was not that the request of the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KING. Yes; that the text be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary is reading the Senate amendment in the nature of a substitute for the House bill, and will continue to read.

Mr. SMOOT. What I desire to do is to follow the Senate bill with the House bill, so that I can see what changes were made and whether they are identical.

The Chief Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the amendment in the nature of a substitute, which, entire, is as follows:

That all persons who served 90 days or more in the military or naval service of the United States during the war with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, or the China relief expedition, and who have been honorably discharged therefrom, or who, having served less than 90 days, were discharged for disability incurred in the service in line of duty, and who are now or who may hereafter be suffering from any mental or physical disability or disabilities of a permanent character not the result of their own vicious habits which so incapacitates them for the performance of manual labor as to render them unable to earn a support, shall, upon making due proof of the fact, according to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may provide, be placed upon the list of invalid pensioners of the United States and be entitled to receive a pension not exceeding $50 a month and not less than $20 a month, proportioned to the degree of inability to earn a support, and in determining such inability each

SEC. 2. The widow of any officer or enlisted man who served 90 days or more in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the war with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, or the China relief expedition, between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902, inclusive, service to be computed from date of enlistment to date of discharge, and that all leaves of absence and furloughs under General Orders, No. 130, August 29, 1898, War Department, shall be included in determining the period of pensionable service, and was honorably discharged from such service, or, regardless of the length of service, was discharged for or died in service of a disability incurred in the service in line of duty, such widow having married such soldier, sailor, or marine prior to September 1, 1922, shall, upon due proof of her husband's death, without proving his death to be the result of his Army or Navy service, be placed upon the pension roll at the rate of $30 a month during her widowhood. And this section shall apply to a former widow of any officer or enlisted man who rendered service as hereinbefore described and who was honorably discharged, or died in service due to disability or disease incurred in the service in line of duty, such widow having remarried either once or more after the death of the soldier, sailor, or marine, if it be shown that such subsequent or successive marriage has or have been dissolved, either by the death of the husband or husbands or by divorce on any ground except adultery on the part of the wife and any such former widow shall be entitled to and be paid a pension at the rate of $30 a month, and any widow or former widow mentioned in this section shall also be paid $6 a month for each child under 16 years of age of such officer or enlisted man, and in case there be no widow or one not entitled to pension under any law granting additional pension to minor children the minor children under 16 years of age of such officer or enlisted man shall be entitled to the pension herein provided for the widow and in the event of the death or remarriage of the widow or forfeiture of the widow's title to pension the pension shall continue from the date of such death, remarriage, or forfeiture to such child or children of such officer or enlisted man until the age of 16 years: Provided, That in case a minor child is insane, idiotic, or otherwise mentally or physically helpless the pension shall continue during the life of such child, or during the period of such disability; and this proviso shall apply to all pensions heretofore granted or hereafter granted under this or any former statute: Provided further, That when a pension has been granted to an insane, idiotic, or otherwise helpless child, or to a child or children under the age of 16 years, a widow or former widow shall not be entitled to a pension under this act until the pension to such child or children terminates unless such child or children be a member or members of her family and cared for by her; and upon the granting of pension to such widow or former widow payment of pension to such child or children shall cease, and this proviso shall apply to all claims arising under this or any other law.

SEC. 3. Any soldier, sailor, or marine or nurse now on the pension roll or who may be hereafter entitled to a pension under the act of June 5, 1920, or under that act as amended by the act of September 1, 1922, or under this act on account of his service during the war with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, or China relief expedition, who is now or hereafter may become, on account of age or physical or mental disabilities, helpless or blind, or so nearly helpless or blind as to need or require the regular aid and attendance of another person, shall be given a rate of $72 a month, provided such disabilities are not the result of his or her own vicious habits: And provided further, That no one while an inmate of the United States Soldiers' Home or of any national or State soldiers' home shall be paid more than $50 per month under this act.

SEC. 4. That the pension or increase at the rate of pension herein provided for, as to all persons whose names are now on the pension roll, or who are now in receipt of a pension under existing law, shall commence at the rates herein provided on the fourth day of the next month after the approval of this act, except where otherwise herein provided; and as to persons whose names are not now on the pension roll, or who are not now in receipt of a pension under existing law, but who may be entitled to a pension under the provisions of this act, such pensions shall commence from the date of filing application therefor in the Bureau of Pensions after the approval of this act in such form as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior; and the issue of a check in payment of a pension for which the execution and submission of a voucher was not required shall constitute payment in the event of the death of the pensioner on or after the last day of the period covered by such check, and it shall not be canceled, but shall become an asset of the estate of the deceased pensioner.

SEC. 5. Nothing contained in this act shall be held to affect or diminish the additional pension to those on the roll designated as "The Army and Navy Medal of Honor Roll," as provided by the act of April 27, 1916, but any pension or increase of pension herein provided for shall be in addition thereto, and no pension heretofore granted under any act, public or private, shall be reduced by anything contained in this act.

SEC. 6. No claim agent, attorney, or other person shall contract for, demand, receive, or retain a fee for service in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting claims for the increase of pension provided for in this act; and no more than the sum of $10 shall be allowed for such service in other claims thereunder, which sum shall be payable only on the order of the Commissioner of Pensions; and any person who shall, directly or indirectly, otherwise contract for, demand, receive, or retain a fee for service in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting any claim under this act, or shall wrongfully withhold from the pensioner or claimant the whole or any part of the pension allowed or due to such pensioner or claimant under this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall, for each and every offense, be fined not exceeding $500 or be imprisoned not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 7. That all acts and parts of acts in conflict with or inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby modified and amended only so far and to the extent as herein specifically provided and stated.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. BAYARD subsequently said: Mr. President, I was attending a conference when the vote was taken on H. R. 8132, the Spanish War veterans' pension bill. Had I been present, I would have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. SWANSON. My colleague [Mr. GLASS] is necessarily absent from the city.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that Senate bill 3300 be indefinitely postponed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, Senate bill 3300 will be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask that the indefinite postponement of the Senate bill be delayed, and that the bill be left upon the calendar.

Mr. SMOOT. It is identical with the bill which has just passed the Senate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I know that it is, but the House has not concurred in the Senate amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, but if they do not, then they would not agree to the Senate bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It might be possible to take up the Senate bill, under that unusual set of circumstances, and legislate with that in mind. I merely ask that it be allowed to remain on the calendar.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? Without objection, the action indefinitely postponing Senate bill 3300 is reconsidered.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Let it remain on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will remain on the calendar, and will be passed over.

JAMES B. FITZGERALD

Mr. CARAWAY. I ask unanimous consent to return to Order of Business No. 273, Senate bill 2200, for the relief of James B. Fitzgerald. The junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] objected a moment ago, but he has informed me that he wants to withdraw his objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill has been considered as in Committee of the Whole, and a certain amendment has been made to it. The question now is, Shall the bill be reported to the Senate?

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of James B. Fitzgerald."

TRUTH IN FABRICS

The bill (S. 1618) to prevent deceit and unfair prices that result from the unrevealed presence of substitutes for virgin wool in woven or knitted fabrics purporting to contain wool and in garments or articles of apparel made therefrom, manufactured in any Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia, or transported or intended to be transported in interstate or foreign commerce, and providing penalties for the violation of the provisions of this act, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. WALSH subsequently said: May I inquire what disposition was made of Senate bill 1618?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It went over under objection.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] if it is his purpose to press for the consideration of that measure, generally known as the "truth in fabrics" bill?

Mr. CAPPER. I understand that to-day we are considering only unobjected bills on the calendar. I do intend to ask for a vote on the measure known as the "truth in fabrics" bill. It is one farm relief measure on which every farm organization in the country is united, proposing legislation such as is recommended by the Committee on Interstate Commerce. I hope to have a vote on the measure before the present session is ended.

Mr. WALSH. I express the hope that the Senator will be insistent upon the consideration of the measure by the Senate. The subject has been before the Congress for a great many years, and a similar measure has come before us often. It ought to have a hearing before the Senate.

Mr. CAPPER. At the first opportunity offered I shall seek to have the bill taken up.

POTASH DEPOSITS

The bill (S. 1821) authorizing joint investigations by the United States Geological Survey and the Bureau of Soils of the United States Department of Agriculture to determine the location and extent of potash deposits or occurrence in the United States and improved methods of recovering potash therefrom was announced as next in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let that go over.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I think this is a matter of such importance, there is such a necessity of ascertaining the fact as to matters which have been considered by the Committee on Agriculture of importance to agricultural interests, that this bill should be passed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suggested that it go over because there appears to be no concurrence by the Department of Agriculture and no report from them.

Mr. SMITH. I understand that the Department of Agriculture has recommended this legislation. The Geological Survey has indicated that there are large deposits of potash in our country, and we want to ascertain all the facts in reference to them, because we are wholly dependent upon Germany. This is to authorize these departments to make investigations and to report as to the facts pertaining to this subject. I think the bill ought to be passed.

Mr. WALSH. I express the hope that no objection will be urged to the consideration of this measure.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I offer no objection.

The bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be, and hereby is, authorized to be appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $550,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1926, and a similar amount for each succeeding fiscal year for four years, to be expended jointly in the proportion above mentioned, by the United States Geological Survey and the Department of Agriculture, respectively, for the purpose of determining the location and extent of potash deposits in the United States and new and improved methods of recovering potash from other substances: Provided, That before undertaking drilling operations upon any tract or tracts of land the Secretary of the Interior shall enter into a contract with the owners or lessees, or both, of the mineral rights therein, which contract shall provide, in the event that commercial amounts of potash or other valuable minerals are discovered, for reimbursement to the United States of not more than the actual cost of the exploration, and this claim for reimbursement shall constitute a preferred claim against any minerals developed and against any enhanced values due to the discovery of mineral in the land: Provided further, That such contract shall not restrict the Secretary of the Interior in the choice of drilling locations within the property or in the conduct of the exploratory operations, so long as such selections or conduct do not interfere unreasonably with the use of the surface of the land or with the improvements thereon, and the United States shall not be liable for damages on account of such reasonable use of the surface as may be necessary in the proper conduct of the work: Provided further, That before such drilling be commenced the owners of the land lying within a radius of 10 miles of the proposed well, in consideration of the great increase in value to their land incident to any discovery of potash and in order to prevent profiteering, be required to enter into an agreement whereby the Department of the Interior is empowered to act as referee in determining the maximum price at which the potash rights of such land can be sold, and, furthermore, that the purchasers of such rights, in consummating the purchase and in consideration of the advantage accruing from an equitable price for such rights as effected by the said department, be required to enter into an agreement whereby the potash obtained by them shall be marketed at a price not in excess of a maximum determined by the department as equitable, and, furthermore, from the net profits of such sales shall pay to the Government 10 per cent per annum until the Government shall have been reimbursed for the expenditure incurred in the exploration of the deposits in point.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry reports as an amendment that the preamble be stricken out.

The amendment was agreed to.

INDEBTEDNESS OF ITALY TO THE UNITED STATES

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 3 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 6773.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6773) to authorize the settlement of the indebtedness of the Kingdom of Italy to the United States of America.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to read a telegram at this time.

NEW YORK, N. Y., April 14, 1926.

Senator McKELLAR,

United States Senator from Tennessee,

Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

Five thousand Italian-Americans at a mass meeting in New York City under the auspices of the Anti-Fascist League of North America wish to congratulate you on your attitude against Mussolini and Fascism. Fascism must not be confounded with the Italian people. It is a murderous, autocratic, and coercive band of brigands which has destroyed law and order, liberty and democracy, and has placed 42,000,000 of liberty-loving people in abject slavery by threats, castor-oil beatings, and murder. America, whose traditions are freedom and democracy, should have nothing to do with Mussolini and his henchmen who are the antithesis of American ideals. We trust that your conferees in the United States Senate will follow your example, thus preparing the ground for a new Italy whose government we hope will soon be one for the people and by the people.

CHARLES FAMA, M. D.,

236 East Two hundredth Street, New York City.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I submit the following unanimous-consent agreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the proposed agreement.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, by unanimous consent, That on the calendar day of Saturday, April 17, 1926, at not later than 2 o'clock p. m., the Senate will proceed to vote without further debate upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment or any motion that may be offered, and upon the bill (H. R. 6773) to authorize the settlement of the indebtedness of the Kingdom of Italy to the United States of America, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after the hour of 12 o'clock m. on said calendar day no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 15 minutes upon the bill, or more than once or longer than 15 minutes upon any amendment offered thereto; and that when the Senate concludes its business on Friday, April 16, it recess until Saturday, April 17, at 12 o'clock m.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the rule the clerk will call the roll to establish the fact that a quorum is present.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Ernst	McKellar	Sackett
Bingham	Fernald	McLean	Sheppard
Blaise	Ferris	McMaster	Shortridge
Borah	Fess	McNary	Smith
Bratton	Fletcher	Metcalf	Smoot
Broussard	Frazier	Moses	Stanfield
Bruce	Gillett	Neely	Stephens
Cameron	Goff	Norbeck	Trammell
Capper	Hale	Nye	Tyson
Caraway	Harrell	Oddie	Wadsworth
Copeland	Harris	Overman	Walsh
Couzens	Hedlin	Phipps	Warren
Cummins	Howell	Pine	Watson
Curtis	Johnson	Pittman	Weller
Dale	Jones, Wash.	Ransdell	Wheeler
Deneen	Kendrick	Reed, Mo.	Williams
Dill	Keyes	Reed, Pa.	Willis
Edge	Lenroot	Robinson, Ark.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the secretary of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has just notified me that the Senator is on the way from one of the departments. I understood that he would be here at 3 o'clock and that is the reason why I asked that the unfinished business be laid aside until that hour. His clerk informs me that he will not be here for about 10 minutes. I therefore ask unanimous consent to withdraw the unanimous-consent proposal at this time, and that we proceed to the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar where we left off, until the Senator from Missouri arrives in the Chamber.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I make a suggestion to the Senator from Utah? I suggest that he modify his unanimous-consent request.

Mr. SMOOT. In what way?

Mr. BORAH. So that we shall vote at 4 o'clock on Saturday and that each Senator shall have 30 minutes on the bill to use as he chooses.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. This morning when the subject was first mentioned and the proposal was made to try to reach some sort of an agreement, it was found that one Senator at least would have to leave here shortly after 2 o'clock on Saturday afternoon and he was very anxious that the vote should be taken before leaving. It was then proposed to carry the matter over until Monday when four other Senators announced that they would be compelled to be away on Monday and they would therefore object to any arrangement to have it go over to Monday.

I merely state this in order to show the reason for seeking to agree to vote at 2 o'clock on Saturday. There is no desire on the part of anyone to cut off debate. I myself would like to see the debate continue as long as anyone wants to speak, but it will be necessary to consult the convenience of Senators who find it necessary to leave.

Mr. BORAH. I should not want to interfere with the Senator, who, I understand, must go away at 2 o'clock.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I was willing to vote at 2 o'clock for that reason, to serve the convenience of Senators who had told me they were compelled to leave immediately after that hour. I have no objection to meeting even at 10 o'clock on Saturday.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing to meet at 10 o'clock or 11 o'clock on Saturday. If we meet at 10 o'clock, it would give four hours for debate, but there are two Senators who must leave, as they have said, not later than 2 o'clock on Saturday.

Mr. REED of Missouri entered the Chamber.

Mr. SMOOT. Inasmuch as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has just entered the Chamber, I withdraw my request to postpone the unanimous-consent proposal.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, I have no desire to obstruct the business of the Senate. I regard this proposal as a species of intolerable grand larceny. I intend to resist it by every means in my power, and I shall object to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. SMOOT. I see no other course to pursue than to proceed with the consideration of the unfinished business.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, while Senators are seeking to come to an agreement as to the time to vote on the Italian debt settlement bill, I shall occupy a little time with a discussion of the proposed amendment to the Volstead Act.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield before he proceeds further?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to resubmit the unanimous-consent agreement changed to read as follows:

Ordered, by unanimous consent, That on the calendar day of Wednesday, April 21, 1926, at not later than 2 o'clock p. m., the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment or any motion that may be offered, and upon the bill (H. R. 6773) to authorize the settlement of the indebtedness of the Kingdom of Italy to the United States of America, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after the hour of 12 o'clock m. on said calendar day no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 15 minutes on the bill, or more than once or longer than 15 minutes upon any amendment offered thereto; and that when the Senate concludes its business on Tuesday, April 20, 1926, it recess until Wednesday, April 21, at 12 o'clock m.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, may we have the proposed agreement reported from the desk in order that all may hear it?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Clerk will read the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, by unanimous consent, That on the calendar day of Wednesday, April 21, 1926, at not later than 2 o'clock p. m., the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment or any motion that may be offered, and upon the bill (H. R. 6773) to authorize the settlement of the indebtedness of the Kingdom of Italy to the United States of America, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after the hour of 12 o'clock m. on said calendar day no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 15 minutes upon the bill or more than once or longer than 15 minutes upon any amendment offered thereto, and that when the Senate concludes its business on Tuesday, April 20, it recess until Wednesday, April 21, at 12 o'clock m.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it is well known to everyone that after these unanimous-consent agreements are entered into we never have any debates that anyone pays any attention to until the day of the voting. We go about our other affairs and give very little consideration to the matter which is to be voted upon. I therefore ask that this agreement be amended so as to make the hour for its taking effect 4 o'clock and to give a Senator 30 minutes to use as he chooses. If he wants to speak 30 minutes on the bill, let him speak 30 minutes, but make the hour not later than 4 o'clock.

Mr. MOSES. Does the Senator from Idaho mean by using the expression "as he chooses" that a Senator may yield to some other Senator if he so desires?

Mr. BORAH. I meant to say that the Senator should use the time himself, not referring to anyone else.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I suggest that we might have that privilege, for during that period, having the floor, I might wish to yield it to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Or vice versa.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I should object to that, Mr. President.

Mr. BORAH. I am not asking it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think it would be a bad precedent to establish to allow a Senator to get the floor and instead of using the time himself parcel it out among favorites. I will object to any arrangement such as that, either now or hereafter.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Then, I will object to the agreement.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask the Senator from California not to do that.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Well, I am objecting. I hope the Senator will be good enough to consult me now and then in regard to these unanimous-consent agreements.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Of course the Senator from California has the same right as has any other Senator to object, and I am heartily in favor of his exercising his constitutional right now and hereafter. He ought to do it more often. The country is greatly benefited by the exercise of those constitutional rights, and, so far as I am concerned, I hope he will continue to exercise them.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I do not desire to indulge in any irony or sarcasm. I think I have been very courteous. I have never raised my voice in objection to any proposed unanimous-consent agreement. The thought I threw out by my suggestion has been expressed to me many times by Senators in this Chamber. It occurs to me now that it has some merit. I can well imagine that my friend from Arkansas—he can not provoke me into replying in a sarcastic vein—

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Why, Mr. President—

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Pardon me a moment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Does the Senator think I am trying—will the Senator from California yield to me?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Does the Senator from California imagine that I am trying to provoke him? Mr. President, I am supporting him in the exercise of his right, but I will reaffirm the proposition that the practice of a Senator getting the floor with the privilege of parcelling out the time will not be indulged in hereafter.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President—

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I say—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Yes; I yield with pleasure.

Mr. BORAH. I did not mean to ask for the privilege of parcelling out the time. I only meant that a Senator might use it himself.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is all right. I have no objection to that.

Mr. BORAH. I prefer to have it arranged that way.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I perhaps misunderstood my friend from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. He has ever been courteous to me, and I have endeavored to be so to him. I pay great heed to his opinion as to the wisdom of the rules of this body, as, perhaps, the RECORD will show. It has, however, occurred to me that it would be very wise when under a unanimous-consent agreement we enter the period for limited debate to permit a Senator having the floor to yield a little of his allotted time to another if he thought that by so doing his cause would be better presented and advanced. I see no harm in that practice. At any rate, I am not persuaded against that proposition. I may, however, be in error. Indeed, I thought when the Senator from Idaho made his request that he intended to convey that idea.

Mr. BORAH. No; I did not have that in mind.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The Senator from Idaho has now made that perfectly plain.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if I may make the suggestion to the Senator, as it is a debatable matter as to whether we should yield time, and so forth, and one which we may want to consider at some length on some other occasion, suppose we waive it in this particular instance and take it up later.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. To show that I am a good-natured man, I accept his suggestion and offer no objection to the agreement requested by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, I agree with everybody. [Laughter.] But I want to make an inquiry of the Senator. Is it the intention of the Senator to keep the debt settlement measure before the Senate constantly from now until next Wednesday, or will opportunity be afforded to consider other bills in the meantime.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the unanimous-consent agreement shall be entered into, whenever a Senator desires to speak upon the bill I shall ask that it be laid before the Senate, and when no Senator desires to speak upon it I shall ask that it be laid aside.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. That goes into the agreement practically as stated here, of course?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, as the Record of yesterday's proceedings will disclose, I have received telegrams and letters from a large number of citizens of Arizona urging me to vote for this bill, and on matters of policy I am inclined to yield to the wishes of my constituents. I wish the bill to be disposed of early, but I am unable to agree to Wednesday. I will be glad to agree to Thursday, April 22, but I am unable to agree to Wednesday. I deeply regret to interpose an objection.

Mr. SMOOT. I hope the Senator will not object.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, let us find out if there is anybody who is going to be away on Thursday.

Mr. ASHURST. I am not going to be away, but I am not ready to vote.

Mr. SMOOT. I beg the Senator not to object.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, at great personal sacrifice—and I speak in all seriousness—I will withdraw the objection.

Mr. SMOOT. I thank the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it is understood, of course, that the words "15 minutes" are to be changed to "30 minutes," and that the vote is to be at 4 o'clock on Wednesday, April 21.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the unanimous-consent agreement as finally entered into.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Ordered, by unanimous consent, That on the calendar day of Wednesday, April 21, 1926, at not later than 4 o'clock p. m. the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment, or any motion that may be offered, and upon the bill (H. R. 6773) to authorize the settlement of the indebtedness of the Kingdom of Italy to the United States of America, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after the hour of 12 o'clock m. on said calendar day no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 30 minutes upon the bill, or upon any amendment offered thereto, and that when the Senate concludes its business on Tuesday, April 20, it recess until Wednesday, April 21, at 12 o'clock m.

Mr. SMOOT. That has been agreed to?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The agreement has been entered into.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, I did not object to the unanimous-consent agreement, and I wish briefly to state why. First, I do not want to be in the position of holding up the business of the Senate; second, I am unable to hold up this bill effectively. If there were sufficient Senators to stand with me and who were inclined, as I am inclined, to talk on it until next December, I would stand with them and hold the fort from morning until night and until the next morning, until cloture at least was once more applied in favor of foreign nations; but I do not find a disposition to make that kind of a battle. Senators who have spoken against the bill are content with the persistence they have made, and they are, of course, entirely within their rights.

I shall take occasion to express myself on this bill a little later; but I wish now to say that I regard it as the worst piece of larceny ever attempted upon the taxpayers of this country. No matter how we may gloss it, no matter what excuse may be offered, we are, at the expense of the taxpayers of this country, making a present to Italy of between a billion and a half and two billion dollars. I regard the proposition as indefensible, as monstrous, as infamous, and I believe that when the question comes to be submitted, as it will be submitted, to the American people there will be other reports like that which we received from Illinois this morning.

THE PROHIBITION LAW

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it has been about eight years since we amended the Constitution of the United States and incorporated in it what is known as the eighteenth amendment. That amendment was not adopted, as is so often said, in haste or without due consideration and deliberation upon the part of the people of the United States. For some 50 years the subject of prohibition had been under discussion throughout the country, and, if I remember correctly, at the time of the ratification of the amendment 33 States of the Union had adopted prohibition. After the amendment was submitted to the States for ratification, I believe, all except two States ratified it. No amendment to the Constitution has ever been adopted after so full and prolonged a consideration as was the eighteenth amendment. Whatever its merits or its demerits may be, whether it should be now repealed or modified, there can be little controversy over the proposition that it was a deliberate act at the time it was written into the Constitution of the United States. It was perfectly clear at that time that the people intended to promulgate a national policy and that policy they inserted into their charter of government.

This amendment provides, in part, as follows:

SECTION 1. After one year from the ratification of this article the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from, the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

The language is specific and all-encompassing—that the manufacture, or sale, or importation, or exportation of intoxicating liquors "for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited."

This part of the Constitution has been construed by the Supreme Court of the United States; and in the first important case which went to the court involving a construction of it, the court said that the first section of the amendment, the one embodying the prohibition, is operative through the entire territorial limits of the United States, binds all legislative bodies, courts, public officers, and individuals within those limits, and of its own force invalidates every legislative act, whether by Congress, by a State legislature, or by a Territorial assembly, which authorizes or sanctions what the amendment prohibits.

The second section of the amendment—the one declaring that—does not enable Congress or the several States to defeat or thwart the prohibition but only to enforce it by appropriate means.

The Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation—

Thus, Mr. President, there was written into the fundamental law, into the charter under which we live, an inhibition against the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquors, and that binds the Congress of the United States, the several legislatures of the different States, the courts of the country, and each and every particular individual in the country; and so long as it remains in the Constitution it is the duty of the several legislatures, of the Congress, of the courts, of all agencies of government, of all public officials and of individuals to obey and in their respective places in organized society to assist in the enforcement and upholding of the Constitution. It imposes a responsibility and an obligation which neither the Congress nor the State legislatures can honorably shirk or in decency pass on to some other body. It binds every official and every citizen, and so long as it remains there it is the first duty of good citizenship to respect it and seek to uphold it.

We are now, Mr. President, engaged in a great campaign to find a way by which to evade the Constitution of the United States without apparently doing so; to find a method or a means by which we can counteract or nullify its terms and conditions without specifically repealing this part of the Constitution or without modifying it directly. It is a campaign to sterilize the Constitution while professing to respect it.

No one contends that those who are opposed to prohibition have not the right to carry on a campaign for the purpose of changing the Constitution. Any citizen or any body of citizens who believe that this is an unwise policy, that it is a policy which can not be sustained, a principle which can not be enforced, are not subject to criticism in their effort to remedy it by eliminating it from the fundamental law of the land; but the point which I desire to stress at this time and at all other times in the discussion of this matter in which I shall take part is that so long as it remains a part of the Constitution, so long as it is unchanged, it is the duty of every citizen loyally to support and maintain it, not only in letter but in spirit.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. The Senator, as I followed his argument, implies that the national prohibition act which was passed by Congress as a method of enforcing the eighteenth amendment is as liberal an interpretation of the eighteenth amendment as Congress would be justified in making. Does the Senator take that position?

Mr. BORAH. I will come to that discussion in a few minutes. I am going to take up the proposed amendment.

Mr. EDGE. I desired to ask two or three questions in that connection. If the Senator prefers to have me wait, I will do so.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; if I do not cover the matter, I invite the Senator to the floor for the purpose of elucidating it by questions, because I have no desire to avoid that proposition. It is a legitimate part of the discussion, and we should be perfectly willing to discuss it.

As I said, the right to amend the Constitution is a right which can not be denied, and no one can be criticized for seeking to amend it. I desire to say, in passing, that the insertion of this amendment in the Constitution of the United States involved what to my mind was a very serious governmental proposition. Whether it was wise to take over from the States the great body of police power which we took over from the States at the time we amended the Constitution is a very serious problem—not only a problem relating to the question of prohibition, but a problem relating to the fundamental principles upon which our Government is organized. It touches the great and vital question of local self-government, and I do not wish to minimize its importance in this problem of prohibition. I find no fault, therefore, with those who believing it to have been a mistake would seek to correct the mistake by amending the Constitution.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator comment upon another phase of the eighteenth amendment? Is it not also extraordinary in that its ratification amounted to the insertion of a sumptuary police statute in a constitution, thereby depriving the majority of the people as represented in the House of the Congress of any opportunity of legislating upon a problem of that kind by simple enactment of law?

Mr. BORAH. Undoubtedly, Mr. President, that is one of the serious problems which are involved in this matter; and I think perhaps that is incorporated in the other proposition which I made relative to the attempt to take over and take into the Constitution a principle of police power, and drawing away from the States the police power which heretofore had belonged to them.

But, Mr. President, those things can only be changed by an amendment of the Constitution itself. If it was a mistake to draw to the National Government this police power, if it was a mistake to put into the Constitution of the United States a principle of sumptuary law, the only way in which it can possibly be met is by a proposal either to repeal the eighteenth amendment or to modify it. Indeed, Mr. President, I doubt very much if modification will reach it. It seems to me if we are going to deal with the question which we are now discussing—the question of whether it is wise to take over this police power or to deal with this matter as a sumptuary principle in the Constitution—we can not meet it except by an elimination of the provision of the Constitution itself. So long as the Constitution stands one thing is more fundamental than prohibition, and that is the enforcement and the upholding of the Constitution. It involves the question of whether we are a law-abiding people.

We are discussing, these days, the question of what we shall do with reference to amending this provision of the Constitution; and about the first suggestion that comes to me when I suggest that the situation can be met only by constitutional amendment is that it takes too long, that it will take an infinite amount of time to change the Constitution of the United States, and that there must be some way by which the law can be so modified that we can get intoxicating liquor without offending the Constitution itself. In other words, the clear implication is that by ignoring not only the spirit of the Constitution but the letter of the Constitution, we can pass a law which will give percentages of alcohol sufficient to enable the people to enjoy, as they claim, their right to the use of intoxicating liquor. Impatience with the law is mob rule. The man hunting his neighbor with a shotgun is simply impatient with the law, and those who would disregard the Constitution because it takes too long to amend it are appealing to the spirit of the mob.

Mr. President, it is no part of the duty of a citizen to ferret out means by which to escape from the terms of the Constitution. It is no part of good citizenship, in my judgment, when citizens find in the Constitution a provision which they do not like, to see how far they can possibly go toward evading it or nullifying it without getting within the inhibition which the courts might lay upon them. So long as the provision is there, instead of seeking means to evade it, it is the duty of the citizens of the United States to find means to enforce it. If the means do not exist at this time, if the law is not sufficient and efficient, and if the power behind the law is not sufficient to enforce it, then, instead of finding means by which to evade it, it is our duty, and the obligation rests upon us, to find more effective means by which to make the Constitution effective. Change it if you will; rewrite it again if you may; but so long as it is there, it is the duty of every loyal citizen to see to its enforcement.

Some of the propositions which have been made seem to me most extraordinary. If there rests upon the Federal Government one peculiar exclusive and supreme duty it is to see to the enforcement and the maintenance of the Constitution of the United States and not leave its enforcement to the several States of the Union. The respective States of the Union are not primarily the custodians of the integrity of the Constitution. The custodian of that integrity is the Federal Government itself. To my mind any scheme or any plan which would shift to the States alone the obligation or the burden of enforcing the Constitution is a most pronounced evasion of the most solemn obligation which rests upon the National Government, and that is to protect its own charter, protect its own life, for the Constitution is its life.

The United States attorney for New York a few days ago in an interview said:

Let Congress modify the Volstead Act so as to permit each State to define nonintoxicating liquor, this definition to bind both State and Federal authority.

So modify the Volstead Act as to permit each State to be the judge of how and to what extent the Constitution of the United States applies in this respect and what is an interpretation and what is an enforcement of the Constitution of the United States? The proposal is not to amend the Constitution of the United States. The provision which imposes upon the National Government the inhibition of the sale and use of intoxicating liquors remains; but the proposal is to modify the statute which was passed, leaving the enforcement of the principle of the Constitution and the protection of the integrity of the Constitution to the respective States, while the National Government itself entirely abandons that obligation.

It is seriously proposed that the Federal Government shall abandon the interpretation and enforcement of its own great charter and through sheer cowardly, contemptible expediency leave it to 48 States with 48 different rules and standards to enforce and uphold it. To such desperate and despicable expediency do men resort when they have not the candor to urge repeal or the courage to preach open violation.

Mr. President, as a matter of fact, the great Civil War was fought over that principle. To my mind it is treason; it is a deliberate evasion of the Constitution, a nullifying and an annihilating of the charter under which we live. It is disloyalty to the first principle of a Federal Union and a violation of the oath which every Federal officer takes when he takes office.

Why, suppose the State of New York fixes a percentage of alcoholic content such as to be intoxicating. Shall the Congress of the United States and the officials of the United States, the custodians of the Constitution, acquiesce in the proposition and connive at its disregard of the Constitution? Shall we leave it to the State of New York or to the State of Idaho or to the State of California to say when and how and to what extent the Constitution of the United States shall be applied and enforced? It would make 48 standards. You might have a standard of 7 per cent in New York, and if so, they could ship their product to every State of the Union.

You might have a standard of 2 per cent in the State of Louisiana, and yet New York could send her 7 per cent product into the State of Louisiana against the standard which they have established there. We would have 48 different standards, no one guarding or protecting or enforcing or maintaining the Constitution, but 48 different States applying their different rules.

A few days ago there came to me a resolution passed by a committee of one of the dominant parties of the country in a near-by State, and the resolution reads:

Resolved, That the county committee (of the State and county) recommend to the Congress of the United States that the so-called Volstead liquor law be amended so as to permit light wines and beer.

Of course, the constituency for which they were politically speaking understands that "light wines and beer" mean intoxicating liquor. All this disturbance and all this debate are not for the purpose of securing nonintoxicating liquor. The people who are insisting upon this change are not insisting upon the change for the purpose of getting more nonintoxicating liquor. What they understand is that they are to secure intoxicating liquor; that wines and beer such as will give them their intoxicating drinks are to be allowed. We have a great political party, one of the dominant parties in the country, actually passing resolutions petitioning the Congress of the United States to violate or connive at the violation of the Constitution of the United States, and doing it for sheer political expediency.

Why not say to the people who are asking for light wines and beer, "You can not secure the intoxicating liquors which you desire until you amend the fundamental law under which you live"?

If this question is to be presented to the people, let us present it in such a way that it will raise the real issue, and either give or deny to them that for which they are asking, to wit, intoxicating liquor. The Legislature of the State of New York is now in the course of passing a referendum law, as I understand it, and so far as that is concerned, New York is simply in the lead. Other States will be asked to follow. In the referendum which they are to send out, if they pass the law, will be this question:

Should the Congress of the United States modify the Federal act to enforce the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States so that the same shall not prohibit the manufacture, sale, transportation, importation, or exportation of beverages which are not in fact intoxicating, as determined in accordance with the laws of the respective States?

That would delegate or leave to the respective States the power and the authority to say whether a particular beverage was intoxicating. If the State fixes a percentage which makes it intoxicating, what is the Government of the United States to do? The Government of the United States is to remain silent. The keeper of the Constitution, the sole power to enforce it throughout the Union, is to remain silent and connive at the violation of it from day to day and from year to year. That goes on through all the 48 States of the Union. It means legal chaos, it means constitutional anarchy, it means the breakdown of constitutional government. That referendum challenges the sincerity if not the loyalty of the great State of New York.

The great debate which took place prior to the Civil War was over that one great question, whether the States should determine what laws should be enforced and what should not, under the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator will remember, however, that when the South asked that the fugitive slave law be enforced, legislatures throughout the free States connived, in just the manner the Senator from Idaho has reprobated so strongly, for the purpose of defeating the rights of the South under that law, and passed personal liberty laws. Judges and juries, too, refused to put the law into execution.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator want to plow through that mire of disgrace and degradation again? Does he appeal to a defiance of the Constitution as a precedent?

Mr. BRUCE. I am glad to hear the Senator say it was a period of disgrace and degradation. As far as I know, the Senator is the only member of the Republican Party who has ever made such a confession.

Mr. BORAH. I presume some might doubt my Republicanism, but I do not intend anyone shall challenge my devotion to the Constitution.

Mr. BRUCE. As I look at it, his Republicanism is about the only blemish on the character of the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator would not contend for a moment that the Northern States which undertook by legislation to nullify the provisions of the Constitution which gave the Southern States the right to follow their slaves were applying constitutional principles, would he? They were simply evading, nullifying, and destroying the Constitution itself.

Mr. BRUCE. Yes; but I mention it as another illustration of the fact that when laws undertake to fly in the face of nature they will not be observed.

Mr. BORAH. Very well, Mr. President; the Senator and I will not argue that. But let us go back to the fundamental law and submit that question to the people of the United States and see what they say about it. If they take it out, every man should live up to it with that out, just as now we should live up to it with it in.

Mr. BRUCE. All I meant to say was that slavery became, in the course of time, an offense to the moral instincts of the free States of the Union and of the world, and of course constitutional restraints proved as utterly futile for the purpose of keeping down the bitter hostility excited by the institution of slavery as the eighteenth amendment has proved in keeping down the natural desire of men for a form of rational enjoyment, within proper limits.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho permit me to ask a question?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. If we should carry out the theory that the States should be the interpreters of the Constitution, you could repeal or modify the peonage law and reestablish slavery, could you not?

Mr. BORAH. I suppose you could.

Mr. CARAWAY. If any State should wish to do it; if the States should be the guardians of the Constitution.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, suppose some one in New York or New Jersey or Idaho should make a proposal with reference to determining for itself, as a State, whether or not it would obey the fifteenth amendment, or determining for itself how far it would be bound by the fourteenth amendment, or determining for itself how far it would be bound by the seventeenth amendment.

What would these gentlemen who are now proposing that the States shall pass upon the question as to the extent to which they will be bound by the eighteenth amendment say to such a proposal? Or suppose the fifth article of the Constitution of the United States were involved, where the property rights, the vested interests, of the great property-holding people of the United States are protected; and suppose the Legislature of New York, or a mass meeting in New York, should pass a resolution that the State of New York would determine for itself how far it would be bound by that provision. The Department of Justice here in Washington would have the members of that mass meeting in prison inside of 48 hours as communists and revolutionists. And if any of their ancestors had come here since the American Revolution they would likely seek to deport them as communists.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask another question?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BRUCE. Did not the South after the Civil War determine for itself, without regard to the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Federal Constitution, whether it would or would not have ignorant negro suffrage riveted upon its neck? Did not every southern man of every station in life exercise every power that lay in him to stay the consequences of that frightful curse?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, so far as I know every law passed by the Southern States and now in force with reference to negro enfranchisement, or the right of the Negro to vote, has been sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States as constitutional.

Mr. BRUCE. Another illustration were those amendments of the utter vanity of passing laws that violate the primal instincts of human nature. What good did they do, so far as any practical consequences were concerned? Outraged human nature claimed its rights, and there is nothing which I regard with more satisfaction than the fact that when I was a boy, living in a remote countryside, all the white citizens of that community were banded together like brothers for the purpose of nullifying those amendments to the Federal Constitution, and defeating the will of Congress when it endeavored to enforce them; and, thank God, they defeated it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator is preaching the doctrine of communism here in the Senate of the United States.

Mr. BRUCE. Oh, no.

Mr. BORAH. Yes, the Senator is; he is preaching anarchy.

Mr. BRUCE. It is not the Senator from Maryland, but the Senator from Idaho, who wishes us to recognize the Soviet Government.

Mr. BORAH. I do; and I think it might serve as a good example for us, the way we are proposing to do things in this country at this time. I think we could learn lessons from them if such doctrine as I hear now is to prevail. But do I understand the able Senator from Maryland to contend that the Southern States are now, in violation of the Constitution and in violation of the Supreme Court decisions, disfranchising the negroes of the South?

Mr. BRUCE. I mean to say that the South has solved its own suffrage problems in its own way, and it has solved them so wisely, despite constitutional and statutory inhibitions, that the whole country has acquiesced in its conduct.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator did not answer my question. Does the Senator contend that the solution which he speaks of is a solution in contravention and in violation of the Constitution of the United States and the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. BRUCE. What is the use of asking me to say something that everybody knows? The southern people had to take their choice between constitutional abstractions and civilization, and they selected civilization.

Mr. MOSES. Oh, no, Mr. President, if the Senator from Idaho will permit me. The southern people had another choice. The implications of the Constitution are that a certain vote may be suppressed, but if suppressed, there is a constitutional price to be paid for it. It is a great and high privilege to suppress millions of votes, and why does not southern chivalry come to the front and pay the price which the Constitution mentions?

Mr. BRUCE. I recollect that one of the malefactors who gave the South the greatest trouble after the Civil War was a Moses of South Carolina.

Mr. MOSES. He did not come there; he was raised there. He was not a carpetbagger.

Mr. BRUCE. Surely that State was incapable of producing such fruit as that.

Mr. MOSES. He was not a carpetbagger; he was indigenous.

Mr. BORAH. If I may say just a word in explanation, at the risk, I suppose, of being criticized, I have always thought that the enfranchisement of the negro, at the time it took place, was a mistake. It was unjust to the white and unjust to the colored man.

Mr. BRUCE. Of course, the Senator has thought so.

Mr. BORAH. I have said here on the floor of the Senate I thought it was a mistake to take a race which had been in slavery for 300 years, and overnight put upon them the burdens and the obligations of discharging political duties in a great representative Republic, an almost impossible proposition. It required something of the negro that no race in history could have adequately met. He would have been better off to have worked out through time and education his franchise. But I do not agree with the Senator that at the present time the Southern States are doing these things in violation of the Supreme Court decisions. They have worked out a solution within the Constitution and within the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is precisely what we have done in Tennessee.

Mr. BRUCE. I think the less we say on the subject the better.

Mr. BORAH. I think so.

Mr. BRUCE. But I will say that it cost us a considerable amount of blood and tears to bring the rest of this country to the conclusion that the Senator from Idaho has reached.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Idaho has reached just one conclusion, and I put it plainly and I challenge the Senator from Maryland to controvert it—that so long as the Constitution of the United States remains as it is, it is the duty of every loyal citizen to help enforce it.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Does the Senator hold that the Congress of the United States may fix a higher percentage than one-half of 1 per cent of alcoholic content?

Mr. BORAH. I hold that the issue which we are now seeking to meet is not a percentage within nonintoxicating percentages. What is being sought is to give a percentage which will give these people an intoxicating drink.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Does the Senator contend that the fixing of 1 per cent would be a violation of the spirit or the letter of the eighteenth amendment?

Mr. BORAH. I am not sufficiently familiar with drinks to know, but what I say is that if we fix the percentage, it does not make any difference what it is, so that the beverage is still nonintoxicating, we will have the liquor question here just as prominently and persistently and pronouncedly as ever before. What the Senator's constituency, if he is speaking for the wets, is asking for is an intoxicating drink. They are not asking for a percentage that will add a little more flavor to a drink. They want something which will be intoxicating, and that is what they are fighting for. Does the Senator contend that the people who oppose the present Volstead Act would be satisfied if it were changed so as to give a nonintoxicating drink?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I hope the Senator will permit me to say just a word. The Senator started out by saying that he is not acquainted with liquors, and then he goes on to assume what those who advocate modification want. My purpose in rising was to ask a question. Does not the Senator believe that those who believe that one-half of 1 per cent is not justified under a proper interpretation of the eighteenth amendment are entitled to fix such a percentage by law and have the Supreme Court of the United States pass upon that law, just as they passed upon the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution?

Mr. BORAH. I will answer that, and I trust that my answer will not seem to be offensive, but if we fix the percentage and make it such that it will not give intoxicating liquors to the people who are asking for a change, it will not solve the question at all. What we are seeking to do, as I understand it, is to readjust the situation so as to satisfy, if possible, the country against persistent insistence upon a change of the prohibition law. If we fix it at a percentage which does not give intoxicating liquor, it will solve nothing. On the other hand, if we do fix it at a percentage which will give intoxicating drinks, we will have violated the Constitution.

Mr. BROUSSARD. During the war 3.75 per cent beer was declared nonintoxicating by the Supreme Court of the United States. Would the Senator believe that that is not a reasonable interpretation of the limitation placed upon Congress to define intoxicating liquor and to fix 3.75 per cent?

Mr. BORAH. Suppose we fix it at 3.75 per cent; if it is nonintoxicating and found to be such in practice as well in theory, we will have solved nothing.

Mr. BROUSSARD. We have not tried it. We have not tried 3.75 per cent beer. The people were satisfied with 3.75 per cent beer during the war.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, no.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BRUCE. I am going to try to take up the matter in a little less controversial spirit. The proposition that the Senator seems to be emphasizing is the proposition brought forward by Mr. Buckner. Of course, so far as we are concerned, we are not responsible for any proposition brought forward by Mr. Buckner. The bills which are actually pending before the Committee on the Judiciary are bills which provide for 2.75 per cent and for beer that does not exceed the intoxicating point. So far as I know, the proposition or the question as to what shall be an intoxicating beverage and what shall not be an intoxicating beverage is not proposed to be remanded, so far as we are concerned, to the States at all. Surely the Senator would not undertake to say that 2.75 per cent beer is an intoxicating thing?

Mr. BORAH. Surely the Senator from Maryland would not undertake to say that if it is not intoxicating that the people for whom he speaks would be satisfied?

Mr. BRUCE. I would. In point of fact, I can speak—

Mr. BORAH. I am not speaking now particularly of legal constituents, but I am speaking of the people who are insisting that they have the right to have intoxicating liquor.

Mr. BRUCE. Because the people of Maryland, for illustration, are asking for 2.75 per cent beer, it does not follow that they are asking for an intoxicating beverage. The ordinary alcoholic content of beer made in the city of Baltimore before the adoption of the eighteenth amendment was 3 to 3.5 per cent. The Senator will probably be surprised when I tell him, because it is obvious that he is a highly temperate man—

Mr. BORAH. I am, I trust.

Mr. BRUCE. So am I—that it was the practice of the brewers in Baltimore City to give a gratuitous allowance each day of 16 glasses of beer to each and every driver of a brewery wagon, so slightly intoxicating was the merchantable beer that was sold at that time. A man simply had almost to drown himself—he had to submerge himself practically in a sea of beer—to intoxicate himself on 2.75 per cent beer.

Mr. BORAH. That is according to how long he has been at the business.

Mr. BRUCE. The general idea is that the longer he has been at it the more thoroughly inured he becomes. But the Senator, I think, is mistaken when he ignores the fact that a very large measure of relief, as the opponents of the Volstead Act see it, would be given by a modification of the Volstead Act allowing 2.75 per cent beer. Light wine is a different matter. I have never had much to say about light wines. I am not really sufficiently informed on the subject to know what percentage of alcoholic content we could define in wine that would justify any wine being called a light wine; but so far as beer is concerned there is no reason in the world, if we are influenced simply by considerations of intoxication, why the American population should not be allowed the privilege of drinking beer. The very rich and well-to-do will obtain their wine anyhow; you need not trouble yourself about that.

Mr. BORAH. I am going to trouble myself about it. So long as this Constitution remains as it is I am going to trouble myself about it. I look upon the rich and influential who violate the Constitution as the most dangerous people in the whole community.

Mr. BRUCE. They will take care of it in one way or another, and it does not make any difference how much you concern yourself about it or what abstract propositions you may bring forward with respect to it, they will have it, just as liberal men will have their Sundays without any extreme, puritanical, blue restrictions. Just as they will have all sorts of things without regard to merely teasing, unreasoning restrictions.

I am not going to interrupt the Senator any more, but I wish to direct his attention to the fact that there is nothing in 2.75 per cent beer, if we are right, that is inconsistent at all with the provisions of the eighteenth amendment, which are simply aimed at intoxicating beverages.

Mr. BORAH. In other words, I understand that all this great drive, this universal hubbub throughout the United States, this uproar in the market place, these hearings, and this great fight that is going on, are to get a little more non-intoxicating beverage, more of the same kind of stuff which you now reject.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator knows, so far as I am concerned, that his remark is not applicable to me, because nobody knows better than he does that I have proposed an amendment to the eighteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly. I commend the Senator for his courage and his intelligence in meeting the issue.

Mr. BRUCE. I do not think that 2.75 per cent beer would afford to the rational instincts of the people of this country the full measure of relief to which they are entitled.

Mr. BORAH. That is what I thought! [Laughter.] A Daniel come to judgment!

Mr. BRUCE. And I hope I am going to be a Daniel that will come to such a stern judgment as to sweep away all the unnatural and artificial restrictions of prohibition.

Mr. BORAH. That is what I am talking about. The Senator wants to sweep away the inhibition against intoxicating liquors.

Mr. BRUCE. In the ordinary course of constitutional procedure. We have to take the first step in every relation of life. Now, that 2.75 per cent is the first step. If the people of the United States are not willing to go any further, they will go no further.

Mr. BORAH. Of course we realize that that is the first step, and it is to weaken the law and break down the morale of the situation and then we will have 4 per cent and 5 per cent, and the next thing we will repeal the Constitution.

Mr. BRUCE. It may be that 2.75 per cent beer would afford such a measure of relief to natural human instincts that public opinion would then come to the aid of the law and we would not have this disgraceful spectacle of the law weekly, daily, hourly, momentarily violated in the United States.

Mr. BORAH. In other words, all that stands between the people of the United States and obedience to the law is the difference between 1.75 per cent beer and 3.75 per cent beer.

Mr. BRUCE. No; the difference is the difference between rational municipal ordinances and irrational municipal ordinances which violate one of the elementary impulses of human nature.

Mr. BORAH. The difference, with all due respect to the able Senator from Maryland, is the difference between the Constitution as it is and the Constitution repealed. If the Senator wants to repeal the Constitution of the United States he has a perfect right to start that campaign. No one is justified in criticizing that. The Constitution was made and will be unmade by the people of the United States. If it is not satisfactory to us, let us change it. But what I contend is that all this maneuvering with reference to percentages, and so forth, is to evade the Constitution of the United States, to undermine and destroy the morale of its enforcement, and not for the purpose of solving the question within the provisions of the Constitution.

Mr. BRUCE. But, may I ask the Senator from Idaho, if it is legally competent for us to enact a statute allowing 2.75 per cent beer without violating the provisions of the eighteenth amendment, is there any reason why that should not be done?

Mr. BORAH. Oh, no; but it will not solve anything. It will not settle anything, if it is not intoxicating. Your fight will go on.

Mr. BRUCE. There is where I do not agree with the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator just said that he has not much to say about light wines.

Mr. BRUCE. And I have not.

Mr. BORAH. But there are thousands and hundred of thousands and millions of people in the United States who have something to say about light wines. Will they be satisfied with that beer? They would be offended if you offered them beer.

Mr. BRUCE. I confess my ignorance of that subject. I do not know exactly, technically speaking, what constitutes a light wine and a heavier wine. I do not know. I know, as I said before, that whether we like it or dislike it, the affluent portion of the American population are going to have their wine—Constitution or no Constitution, statute or no statute. That has been demonstrated.

Mr. BORAH. I beg the Senator to permit me to proceed. The Senator has stated the issue. Let us argue it. The Senator has stated that the issue is that they propose to have what they want with reference to intoxicating liquor—

Mr. BRUCE. They do.

Mr. BORAH. Regardless of the Constitution of the United States or the statutes.

Mr. BRUCE. They do.

Mr. BORAH. If that be true, and I have no doubt that is just what the Senator thinks—

Mr. BRUCE. I do.

Mr. BORAH. If that be true, is not the orderly thing to do, so long as we profess to live under a constitutional government, to amend the Constitution in the manner provided by the Constitution itself, and rewrite the charter under which we live? Can the Senator conceive anything more degrading, demoralizing, and undermining to the good citizenship of the people than to have a solemn pledge in the Constitution of the United States and to have great Senators stand upon the floor of the United States Senate and say the people are going to have what they want regardless of whether it is constitutional or not?

Mr. BRUCE. I can conceive of nothing more deplorable, nothing more tragic, nothing more scandalous, but I take human nature as it is. In other words, I look at this question exactly as the free-seller looked at the institution of slavery.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, and when Wendell Phillips spoke with reference to that proposition he said, "To hell with the Constitution."

Mr. BRUCE. Yes; he did.

Mr. BORAH. But there came along the man who, disregarding Wendell Phillips, found a way to solve that great question by amending the Constitution of the United States and effectuating the change which he desired under the Constitution and not in violation of it.

Mr. BRUCE. How did he find it? He found it by tracing his way through fire and smoke and flame and blood.

Mr. BORAH. I am one of those who believe that the Constitution of the United States is of sufficient value, if it is necessary, to trace our way through blood and fire in order to maintain it. [Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

Mr. BRUCE. So do I when a great question like slavery is involved; so do I when a great issue like that of national sovereignty is involved; but not when nothing more is involved than the question as to whether a man shall or shall not be allowed to enjoy what I conceive to be a perfectly legitimate measure of human indulgence.

Mr. BORAH. Yes. Well, Mr. President, there is scarcely any vice that human nature may indulge that the particular person who indulges it does not resent the fact that the law prohibits or inhibits him from doing so.

Mr. BRUCE. That is not so. There is no uprising against punishment for forgery or against punishment for false pretenses and, above all, there is none against punishment for murder or for rape or for arson.

Mr. BORAH. But every man who commits forgery feels toward the law just exactly as the Senator does toward prohibition.

Mr. BRUCE. He does, but his neighbors do not. The difference in this case is not only that the man who takes—

Mr. BORAH. I am not sure that the Senator's neighbors do. That is what I want to find out.

Mr. BRUCE. I have previously stated to the Senator that many of my neighbors regard with great leniency the violation of the Volstead Act, because, as they conceive it, that act has no true moral sanction behind it. It endeavors to pronounce something as being criminal per se that is not so.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, there are hundreds and thousands and millions of people in the United States, as good people as live, who are devoted to law and order, who believe in obedience to law, who take the very opposite view from that of the able Senator from Maryland. They believe that while we are making a fight to maintain those provisions of the Constitution which protect property it is just as necessary to make a fight for the maintenance of the provisions which protect human values and the home.

Mr. BRUCE. That is simply because they are misguided enthusiasts who are incapable of drawing the true line of distinction between what is real criminality and what is merely artificial criminality.

Mr. BORAH. That doctrine will not do in this country.

Mr. EDGE rose.

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDGE. I will wait until the Senator from Idaho shall have finished his remarks.

Mr. BORAH. Let us go back for a moment to what I think is the most serious proposition here. I regard all this discussion of percentages of the alcoholic content of liquor as evading the question, not intentionally, perhaps, upon the part of all those who discuss it. Every Senator here knows from the letters which he receives every day that the thing which many people are asking is not a change of percentage still keeping the liquor nonintoxicating, but what they are writing Senators about now, what they are passing resolutions about, what they are petitioning about is for intoxicating beverages.

It is the duty of the Senate of the United States, if it has not lost all capacity for leadership, to say to these people, "You want intoxicating beverages. We say to you that you can not get them under the Constitution, which we have sworn to support, until you, by the orderly processes pointed out by the Constitution, rewrite that instrument."

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President—

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment. I want to speak for a few moments.

Mr. BRUCE. Of course.

Mr. BORAH. It is our duty to do that, as men whose business it is to uphold the Constitution, who have sworn to support the Constitution and who ought to have some capacity for leadership when the Constitution of the United States is involved. We should say to those who are advocating a change, "What you want is intoxicating liquors, but that is what you can not have until you take out of the Constitution that which the people of the United States put into the Constitution. That is what I am contending for here to-day. Let the people understand that this proposed change of the Volstead Act would settle nothing; it would solve no problem. It would leave liquor here haunting the corridors of the Capitol, and these people would be petitioning Congress next year just the same as they are doing this year. What these people are interested in is doing what the Constitution does not permit them to do."

Mr. BRUCE and Mr. EDGE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield, and, if so, to whom?

Mr. EDGE. I thought the Senator from Idaho had concluded his remarks.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho knows that I have offered an amendment to the Constitution involving a combination of the Quebec plan of government supervision and control and local option; in other words, I am pursuing the very pathway that he thinks that I and those associated with me should pursue. Now I will ask the Senator from Idaho, Does that constitutional amendment meet with his approval or not?

Mr. BORAH. Distinctly not. I do not want this Government to become a saloon keeper. If that must go on, let it be by individuals. But, as I said a moment ago, I do not want to discuss indefinitely and exclusively the question of percentages.

I wish to refer again, for the consideration of the Senate, to the great referendum which the people are going to hold in the State of New York. They are going to petition the Congress of the United States by the voice of the people of New York to do what? To violate the Constitution of the United States. Do the people of a great Commonwealth such as New York, with its distinguished leaders of the past and its distinguished leaders of the present, its great educators, its great lawyers, its great jurists, and its great religionists, propose to come down here with a solemn referendum to the effect that the Congress of the United States shall disregard the Constitution of the United States? They propose to petition us to leave the enforcement of the Constitution to the States—a shameless proposition.

Is it not infinitely better, more in accord with good citizenship and with representative government, that they submit to the people of the State of New York the question of petitioning Congress to submit to the States for ratification an amendment which will take out the eighteenth amendment from the Constitution? Can you meet the question any other way? Is there any other orderly and decent way to proceed? Can you solve the problem by any other method or any other process? I ask, Mr. President, is it honest, is it candid leadership, is it in accord with the principles of the great Republican and Democratic Parties to seek to evade the question by asking us to violate the Constitution of the United States, to disregard it? Let us be candid enough to speak to the people in constitutional language, in language befitting public men in a government of law.

Mr. President, the liquor problem can not be disposed of by amendments which do nothing more than add an additional flavor to the drink. It can not be put at rest by changing the percentage if that percentage fails to give intoxicants. The contest is not over percentages. It involves deeper and more searching questions. After you have made your changes as proposed, if you remain within the provisions of the Constitution, your liquor problem will still be here, unsettled, undetermined, haunting the corridors of Congress and tormenting public opinion, insistent of attention and rapacious in its demands. Deep convictions are found on either side of this question. Great governmental, as well as great moral, problems are involved and percentages will not meet the situation.

But what I arose to say at this time is that whether prohibition stays or goes, rises or falls, the Constitution should be maintained and supported as it is written by all law-abiding people until it is changed in the manner pointed out by the Constitution. Obedience to the law is the rock foundation upon which our whole structure rests. To disregard it is to strike at the life of the Nation. And while disrespect for law applies to all laws, statutes, and enacted laws, there is a more sacred import to that rule of conduct when the Constitution itself is involved. It is the law of the land, the charter of our Government, approved by the people, defining and guaranteeing the rights of the citizen, prescribing the duties, functions, and limitations of government, and to disregard it is to spell the end of order and representative government.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, it occurs to me, from following the eloquent speech of the Senator from Idaho, that he proposes to decide what the Supreme Court may do without permitting the Supreme Court to have an opportunity to decide for itself. That is the burden of most arguments against modification of the Volstead Act. In his argument he advanced the statement—and I believe he was seconded by the Senator from Tennessee—that relief from the fourteenth amendment had been worked out in a way which permitted the Southern States to administer it, within the Constitution, in a manner in which they preferred to administer it. I should like to see a similar opportunity afforded, at least, before individual Senators decide, for the Supreme Court, just what it will do with amendments to the Volstead Act.

The Senator from Idaho has indicated that the alcoholic limitation of the Volstead Act was unquestionably below a fair interpretation, so far as the word "intoxicating" is concerned, of the provisions of the eighteenth amendment. I was a member of the Senate when the Volstead Act was passed, as was the Senator from Idaho, and I recall the debate at that time. The suggestion was advanced by the proponents of the bill that the reason for the inclusion of the words "one-half of 1 per cent" was not to define intoxication but to provide a method or medium through which better enforcement of the eighteenth amendment could be obtained. We have been seven years working on that theory and we have absolutely and utterly failed.

I differ from the Senator from Idaho in his viewpoint that allowing the use of the maximum of alcohol that could be permitted within the term "intoxicating in fact" would not be helpful in this situation. I emphatically contend just the opposite. I believe if the Congress should pass an amendment to the Volstead Act permitting all the Constitution permits it would immediately alleviate the situation.

I may say, Mr. President, that, in my judgment, Congress has not the moral right to deny what the Constitution permits. We have heard a great deal to-day about upholding the Constitution. Then let us try the other experiment of allowing the full limit. Conditions could not be any worse than they are to-day. Senators refer to the hearings which are being held, but the facts that are coming out and going throughout this land as a result of those hearings can not be evaded by Congress if the Members of Congress do their full duty.

I admit beyond any argument that in order to legally obtain what are known as hard spirits or liquors it would be absolutely necessary to repeal or amend the eighteenth amendment; but I contend, side by side with that, if we would amend the Volstead Act and permit the alcoholic content to be as great as the courts might decide to be within the interpretation of the words "intoxicating in fact," we would remedy materially the present deplorable situation; we would at least reduce the discontent and unrest in the country and the challenge and protest against the law which prevail throughout the country. In that way we would, in my judgment, greatly improve conditions and help solve this the problem of all problems facing us to-day.

What is the definition of "intoxicating liquors," so long as it is alleged that nothing within that definition can satisfy? The only decision that I have seen from a Federal judge as to the definition of intoxicating liquor was delivered by Judge Soper, a Federal judge in the district of which Baltimore is a part. I have not a copy of the decision with me, but in effect he says this: Intoxication means what in the ordinary sense the average citizen knows as drunkenness through indulging in alcoholic beverages in quantity equal to what the average human could drink.

In other words, the word "intoxicating" means, according to that judge's decision, real drunkenness. How can we determine here that the Supreme Court, recognizing the sentiment of the country, recognizing as they have in recent years, and I think properly so, the rule of reasonableness in considering all questions, especially those questions which are close to the public—how can we contend that if we pass a bill reciting the very words of the Constitution itself, permitting citizens to have what the Constitution permits them to have, namely, beverages up to the point of being proven intoxicating in fact, that the Supreme Court of the United States would not uphold such an amendment to the Volstead Act? Further, how can we contend such liberty would not reduce the present use of bootleggers' poison?

Would that be evasion? It would not be nullification, Mr. President, if the Supreme Court so affirmatively decided, would it? Then the great State of New York or the great State of New Jersey or the great State of Idaho would have, under the fundamental law of the land, without evasion, the right to manufacture, sell, or use beverages up to the point of being "intoxicating in fact"; and, as I have said, the courts must decide the violation of any law, and they would under such an amendment be given the responsibility to do so.

Such an amendment does not in any way mean that the State of Idaho or the State of Kansas shall not, if their State legislatures so decide, continue the one-half of 1 per cent, or continue without any percentage if they so elect. That is not confusing. It could not be, at any rate, more confusing than it is to-day. If the Supreme Court upholds this limit, then certainly the State courts or the Federal courts within the States would decide cases coming before them in harmony with that limit; and so they should.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for just one moment?

Mr. EDGE. I yield.

Mr. BRUCE. My impression is that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] himself a few days ago offered some amendments to the Volstead Act that might be submitted by way of popular referendum to the people. Is not that the case?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I submitted an amendment to a proposed referendum asking the people whether or not they desired to repeal the eighteenth amendment.

Mr. BRUCE. Were the amendments addressed entirely to the eighteenth amendment? My impression was that they were addressed also to the Volstead Act, were they not?

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator from New Jersey will yield to me—

Mr. EDGE. I yield to the Senator to reply.

Mr. BORAH. I submitted three propositions. The first was whether or not the people desired to amend the Constitution of the United States by taking out the eighteenth amendment; secondly, if they understood light wines and beers for which they were petitioning to be such beverages as were nonintoxicating.

Mr. BRUCE. Was the Senator drafting the second amendment merely as a matter of intellectual recreation?

Mr. BORAH. No; although I do sometimes indulge in that pastime.

Mr. BRUCE. It seems to me the Senator has some inconsistency to defend. Here this afternoon he has been deprecating the idea of any modification of the Volstead Act being entertained, and yet he himself is bound to confess that he was the draftsman of one.

Mr. BORAH. Let me explain the matter to the Senator, and then he will see that I am not inconsistent.

The Senator from New Jersey submitted what he proposed to form into a referendum throughout the United States; and I offered amendments to his referendum for the purpose of inquiring of the people what they understood as to nonintoxicating beverages, what they understood as to the eighteenth amendment, and whether or not they desired to repeal it.

I have not offered any amendment to the Volstead Act. I do not propose to offer any amendment to it; but I am perfectly willing, I will say to the Senator now, if he will work out a process, to take a referendum upon whether or not they desire to repeal the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. BRUCE. Yes; but the Senator's second amendment contemplated the idea that there would be a popular referendum in relation to the question as to whether the people of the United States wanted light wines or beer.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, no; I did not ask them that. I asked them if, in petitioning for light wines and beers, they understood that they would have such an alcoholic content as not to be intoxicating.

Mr. BRUCE. I am very glad, at any rate, to have listened to an explanation of these amendments from the Senator from Idaho, because, notwithstanding the extraordinary lucidity with which he generally conveys his ideas, I have yet to find a single, solitary individual who has ever been able to grasp the real meaning of the amendments suggested by him. Indeed, I am coming to think that the Senator must have suggested them in a satirical or sardonic spirit, because I confess that to me they are wholly unintelligible.

Mr. BORAH. I confess that I have considerable of a sardonic spirit when I am dealing with the question of amending the Volstead Act, because I do not find any sincerity at all behind the proposal. The thing these people are really seeking can not be secured by merely amending the Volstead Act.

Mr. BRUCE. I am sorry to hear the Senator say that, because I have always thought that one of his most splendid virtues was his sincerity of character.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I had no intention of discussing at any considerable length this question at this time. It was introduced by the Senator from Idaho, and I felt should be briefly alluded to, and later I will reply as the subject demands.

I protest very emphatically against the continued inference that a proposal to amend the Volstead Act is a subterfuge. Such a contention is not justified in fact. It is not justified in law. An amendment to the Volstead Act, of course, as a matter of practicability, can be opposed by any Senator. That is his privilege at any and all times; but while the Volstead Act is sacred as all law is sacred, while it is a law, it is no less subject to amendment than any other act that Congress passes, even though it has such influences back of it that it apparently occupies a different position.

Any act of Congress is subject to proper amendment; and when one urges modification of the Volstead Act in the interest of bringing about a more temperate condition, in the interest of trying to alleviate to some extent what I consider the absolutely justified protest and challenge of millions of our people, it is unjust to assume it a move against enforcement of law; neither is it an invitation for violation of the law. It is quite the contrary, in my mind. If the public are entitled to this consideration, why should it be denied? It is a sincere movement to try to help a situation which Senators, whatever may be their public utterances, know perfectly well can not be evaded longer in the best interests of morals, in the best interests of recognition of the sublimity of law, which has been greatly reduced in this country.

In conclusion, I simply desire again to bring this view as forcefully as I can before the Senate. This act has denied, through its one-half of 1 per cent limitation, what the Constitution—the mandate from the people—clearly indicated that they were prepared to try—the prohibition of intoxicating liquor. I repeat, the one-half of 1 per cent limitation was placed there by its proponents to help enforcement. The object has failed. Has not the time arrived for us to be honest with the people who ratified the eighteenth amendment?

If we use the very language of the eighteenth amendment itself permitting beverages up to the point of intoxication, we can not possibly violate the Constitution, because we are simply repeating the Constitution. Then, it becomes a matter for the court—the court to which we have always looked up—to decide whether a citizen is guilty or innocent.

Is that a new doctrine in this country? Is that evading or nullifying the Constitution of this country? On the contrary, that is upholding the Constitution and trying to meet a situation honestly, legally, and squarely. It is the only way, in my judgment—at this time, at least, without the loss of much time through the possible amendment of the eighteenth amendment—in which we can meet the situation.

Conditions can not be worse than they are to-day. If you admit them honestly as they exist, you know it. You must realize what the present regulation is doing to the young men and to the young women, and how in all walks of life the thought of observance or reverence of law is almost a plaything and a football. You can not fairly contend when that condition exists that: "Technically, we can not pass any amendment to the Volstead Act without violating the Constitution." Let the Supreme Court decide that, not Senators here on the floor of the United States Senate. Let us see if legal modification will not help. Give the people all they reserved when they, through their mandate, ratified the eighteenth amendment, and then come back a year or two later and see if the conditions are not 100 per cent better than those we are facing to-day.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, April 14, 1926

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Rev. Walter F. Smith, of the Park View Christian Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, we thank Thee for Thy abiding love and are grateful to Thee for all the blessings of life that Thou hast bestowed upon us. We thank Thee for our beloved country and for her opportunities and ideals. May those ideals ever be held high. Rest Thy blessing upon all in authority. Especially we pray Thee to bless these who have been called to administer the affairs of our Nation. Give to them wisdom and power, that through the guidance of Thy Holy Spirit they may prove what is the good and the acceptable and the perfect will of God.

Hear this our prayer and grant these our petitions, for we ask them in the name of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

GUARDIANSHIP OF INSANE AND INCOMPETENT VETERANS

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD a letter received by me yesterday from Gen. Frank T. Hines, Director of the Veterans' Bureau, on the subject of the 18,000 guardians of insane and incompetent veterans in the United States, together with my own remarks upon the same subject, and upon the subject of my proposed amendments to eliminate fees paid unscrupulous guardians, and also my own remarks upon the medical care, hospitalization, and welfare of the veterans.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, when was this letter written by General Hines?

Mr. KINDRED. It was dated on April 10 and delivered at my office by messenger yesterday.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman is aware of the fact that the Veterans' Committee is preparing to investigate all of these guardianship scandals and that we are preparing to go to the very bottom of all these charges?

Mr. KINDRED. I have heard so unofficially.

Mr. RANKIN. Then, I say to the gentleman officially that that is correct.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Speaker, in order to eliminate fees to unscrupulous guardians of insane and incompetent veterans and to administrators of deceased veterans, I propose the following amendments in addition to several others to be introduced by me to meet this serious situation—

A bill (H. R. 11206) to amend section 26 of the World War veterans' act of 1924;

Also, a bill (H. R. 11207) to amend section 21 of the World War veterans' act of 1924.

Mr. Speaker, my proposed amendments to the veterans' World War act of June, 1924, in the matter of guardianship and administration for the estates of insane and deceased veterans of the World War, were first suggested by me in a speech made by me in the House March 26, 1926, in which I stated, after discussing these abuses:

In this connection, as to the activities of the States in serving the needs of ex-service men, I wish to call attention to what I consider one or two glaring faults of our present law. I believe that these points to which I refer have been or will be covered by amendments that will be proposed by the Veterans' Committee in the legislation before the House.

I refer particularly to the present method of appointing guardians or committees of the person and estate of the insane beneficiary. I had a case pending for some months, which terminated only to-day, where, under the present law, a guardian was appointed by a court in Newark, N. J. I am going to mention the fact, because I referred the whole matter to the Veterans' Bureau, and they took up the whole correspondence, and have used considerable pressure in certain directions, and have gotten results after the matter had gone on in a disgraceful way for several months.

The present law provides for the appointment of a guardian or committee of an insane beneficiary by the local courts of the respective States. Now, it is a sad fact, which some of us in local politics know to be true, that there are a certain number of irresponsible hangers-on around courts who insist on having themselves appointed to responsible positions, and those persons are appointed, but they fail to give the money to the poor, blind, helpless mothers and fathers of the beneficiaries.

The court refused to remove him. The Veterans' Bureau used their influence to have the unprincipled rascal removed in this case which I speak of, who had kept the money from the mother for months.

I hope that the proper committee will report an amendment covering this matter, and also several other amendments which we should adopt, but I will not take the time to discuss them at this time.

I made these charges, based on personal investigation, some time before they were mentioned by others.

The recent charges of abuses by guardians of insane and incompetent war veterans have been made possible by the inadequate provisions of the existing law providing for guardians of insane and incompetent veterans. These abuses have occurred in connection with the appointment under existing law of improper and unscrupulous guardians, not only in the District of Columbia but in various other instances in the different States, as in the flagrant cases I called to the attention of the House of Representatives.

I and other Members of the House of Representatives personally knew of one or more such cases in which there have not only been abuses by guardians but failure of the courts having power to appoint them to remove improper and unscrupulous guardians even after evidence has been presented by Members of Congress and by others of such unscrupulous conduct on the part of the guardians, as alleged in the Fenning case.

The proposed amendments to the veterans' act of 1924, reported March 11, 1926, by the Veterans' Committee of the House as H. R. 10240, do not contain any amendment changing the objectionable features of existing law which have proven so unsatisfactory and have led to the scandals mentioned.

To meet this situation and to eliminate the appointments of guardians by the State courts the constitutional question in cases of insane or incompetent veterans having property located in any State and subject to the protection of the courts of that State has to be considered.

I recently had a personal interview with Gen. Frank T. Hines, Director of the Veterans' Bureau, on this and other phases of my proposed amendments, in which I propose to eliminate the appointment not only of guardians for incompetent veterans but administrators of the estates of deceased veterans by State courts, so that any moneys or equities due such incompetent or deceased veterans from the United States Government may be disbursed and paid directly to the legal dependents or beneficiaries of such veterans, directly by the Veterans' Bureau, through its existing bureau of guardians.

I have consulted able attorneys and they advise that from the viewpoint of saving unnecessary (commissions paid to Fenning were as much as 10 per cent) expense and delay to the veterans and their dependents, as well as the scandals resulting from the present system, that my amendment will prove adequate.

In my interview with the Director of the Veterans' Bureau on the provisions of my proposed amendments, and later, in an interview with one of the legal advisers of the Veterans' Bureau in charge of the department of guardianships and administration, both approved of the chief features of my amendments to eliminate the appointment of guardians by the State courts for insane or incompetent veterans, and administrators for the estates of deceased veterans, for the reasons mentioned.

General Hines's letter to me giving some account of the activities of the Veterans' Bureau in this connection, follows:

UNITED STATES VETERANS' BUREAU,
OFFICE OF THE DIRECTOR,
Washington, April 10, 1926.

Hon. JOHN J. KINDRED,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. KINDRED: In compliance with your request, I am submitting a résumé of the establishment of procedure which is now in force in this bureau in supervising activities of guardians of minors and mental incompetents.

Immediately after I assumed duties as the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau on March 4, 1923, I made inquiry as to bureau policy and procedure in protecting the interests of veterans or dependents of veterans who were under guardianship, and was apprised of the fact that numerous criticisms had reached the bureau to the effect that legally appointed guardians were not fulfilling their trust in making the proper disbursement of funds for the benefit of disabled soldiers. The advice of the general counsel was requested, and he advised that the bureau had no definite policy as to the course of action to be followed in such instances. He pointed out that although there was no specific provision of law under which the bureau could institute proceedings in the State courts for the appointment or removal of guardians, there was no provision of law which inhibited the bureau from taking such steps in cases in which it was deemed necessary.

The general counsel was instructed to institute and conduct court proceedings wherever and whenever necessary to insure the appointment of a proper guardian for a beneficiary adjudged by the medical officers of the bureau to be mentally incompetent, and to institute and conduct similar proceedings for the removal of a guardian and the appointment of another whenever such proceedings were deemed advisable. The outline of this procedure was presented to the Department of Justice and approved by Mrs. Mabel Walker Willebrandt, Assistant Attorney General, and by Mr. A. T. Seymour, Assistant to the Attorney General, who at that time was Acting Attorney General.

Bureau officials were instructed by the director to exercise the greatest diligence in safeguarding the interests of mentally incompetent patients in every possible way.

Subsequently, a committee was appointed to study and report on the guardianship activities of the bureau. The general counsel reported to this committee that his office was checking up on every report which indicated irregularities or negligence on the part of legally appointed guardians and steps were being taken when necessary for the removal of guardians. At that time 18,000 guardians had been appointed and the committee which had been appointed recommended that guardianship activities be centralized in one division in order that closer supervision could be given in these cases.

The guardianship subdivision was established on May 8, 1924. Since that time the bureau has maintained a centralized record of all claimants who are minors or mental incompetents, and an investigation is made in each case of a mentally incompetent at least once annually or more often if necessary, to determine whether his condition had improved, whether the amount paid to the guardian had been properly handled and whether expenditures had been properly made. An accurate record is kept of the name and address of each guardian or person vested with the responsibility or care of a veteran or his estate, of the name and location of the court appointing such guardian, of the amount of the guardian's bond, and any other information pertinent to a close and thorough supervision of the case.

Annual reports required of guardians give the bureau an opportunity to keep a close check on expenditures and, in addition to the information so received, the bureau makes prompt investigation in any case in which correspondence or reports received by the bureau indicate irregularity of payments or misapplication of funds.

There has been appointed in each regional office a guardianship officer who is charged with the responsibility of supervising activities relative to the welfare of minors or mental incompetents who are entitled to the benefits administered by this bureau. This officer maintains close contact with all guardianship matters and investigates any case in which it is charged that the guardian, curator, conservator, or committee is in any manner failing to administer his trust. When an investigation shows any delinquency on the part of such person, the evidence thereof is promptly presented to the court of proper jurisdiction with a view to the removal of such guardian, curator, conservator, or committee, and the appointment of another.

Early investigations of guardianship activities indicated that the bureau was handicapped by the fact that the director was without authority to suspend payments to guardians who had shown evidence of delinquency pending action of the court in such matters. This matter was reported to Congress with the recommendation that the law be amended, and in accordance with this recommendation the last proviso of section 21 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, was added as follows:

"Provided further, That the director, in his discretion, may suspend such payments to any such guardian, curator, conservator, or other person who shall neglect or refuse, after reasonable notice, to render an account to the director from time to time showing the application of such payments for the benefit of such minor or incompetent beneficiary."

The bureau subsequently recommended the addition of section 505 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, which was enacted on March 4, 1925, and reads as follows:

"Every guardian, curator, conservator, committee, or person legally vested with the responsibility or care of the claimant or his estate, having charge and custody in a fiduciary capacity of money paid, under the war risk insurance act as amended, or under the World War veterans' act, 1924, for the benefit of any minor or incompetent claimant, who shall embezzle the same in violation of his trust, or fraudulently convert the same to his own use, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $2,000 or imprisonment at hard labor for a term not exceeding five years, or both."

The regulations of the bureau require that if a patient of an institution is an insane disabled person shown to be entitled to compensation, there shall be paid to the chief officers of such institution any amount necessary for the immediate needs and comforts of such patient and the remaining amount due shall be paid to the guardian. These regulations were issued to insure prompt provision for the needs of incompetent beneficiaries of the bureau.

A very close supervision is maintained over the interests of all incompetent beneficiaries of the bureau and prompt action is taken by the bureau to protect their interests. Copies of Veterans' Bureau regulations and general orders governing guardianship matters are inclosed for your information.

Very truly yours,

FRANK T. HINES, Director.

In my discussion of the subject with the director I emphasized particularly the importance of getting rid of any system of fees or emoluments to be paid in connection with such guardianships or administrations out of the estates or equities of veterans due them from the United States Government.

The evils of the present system have been exemplified in the charges against Commissioner Fenning, of Washington, D. C., who is alleged to have received 10 per cent of all insane veterans' moneys that passed through his hands as guardian, and even to have accumulated a fortune of over $100,000 in a very few years through connivance with the powers that had him appointed as guardian.

My amendment would eliminate and prohibit any fees of any kind to be paid in this connection to any official, either Federal or State, and would preserve to the veteran and his dependents or beneficiaries every cent due him by the United States Government which he has served.

Especially attention is called to the fact that my amendments also provide that all moneys and equities due from the United States Government to any veteran shall be paid directly to the veteran without being subject to any judgments or any claims of any kind against the veteran or his estate.

Whatever may be our estimate of the political, social, or moral results of the World War, there was the inevitable result of such a gigantic conflict, of thousands of sick and disabled soldiers from overseas and from home camps, suddenly and urgently in need of immediate hospitalization and medical care.

On March 17, 1921, and also March 26, 1926, I discussed the status of the neuropsychiatric and disabled wards of the United States Government as of these dates, and particularly stressed certain administrative faults of the United States Veterans' Bureau and the failure of the consultants on hospitalization to more promptly provide hospitals, provided for under liberal appropriations made by Congress.

NEUROPSYCHIATRIC WARDS

The status particularly of the neuropsychiatric ex-service men is to be discussed at this time from the viewpoint of hospitalization, vocational, and professional rehabilitation, disability compensation, and other medical and welfare agencies employed in their interest during and since the emergency referred to.

The United States Public Health Service from the beginning, with inadequate hospital and other facilities, and under great difficulties, coped with the serious problems of supplying proper and humane medical and surgical treatment to the neuropsychiatric and other groups of sick and disabled veterans; and it must in fairness be stated that this service deserves and should receive full credit and commendation for its achievements, this service having in fact laid the broad and deep foundations for the good work in medical and surgical treatment which has, with certain exceptions to be noted, continued by the medical service later created within and subject to the control of the Veterans' Bureau.

The Veterans' Bureau, created under the Sweet bill—passed by the Sixty-seventh Congress—consolidated all governmental activities relating to ex-service men under this bureau.

The singularly disgraceful conduct and subsequent prison sentence of the first director of the bureau, Col. R. C. Forbes, appointed by President Harding, is well known, with all of its disastrous results to the interest of the Government and the ex-service men.

The bureau, under the directorship of Gen. Frank T. Hines, who, while evidencing a personal desire to do justice to the ex-service men, has received both praise and adverse criticism from the disabled American veterans of the World War and the American Legion.

The last (1925) convention of the American Legion made recommendations for greater efficiency of the Veterans' Bureau, particularly relating to improving the medical service. The Legion commended the appointment by the director of the bureau of a council of medical and hospital service, which is composed of eminent specialists, and held that a higher medical personnel could be secured by appropriate legislation than that existing now in the bureau under the civil service. This recommendation is for legislation providing a Veterans' Bureau medical corps similar to that of the United States Public Health Service and the Army and the Navy. The Legion also requested legislation providing for the apportionment of compensation of insane claimants who have dependent parents, so that the amount paid to such parents or dependents shall be paid to them directly instead of to the guardians of the claimants.

The report of the committee on rehabilitation of the 1925 convention of the American Legion, page 34, says:

The Veterans' Bureau has never functioned with the efficiency which the American Legion can consider satisfactory. The evident lack of efficiency must be traceable to some cause. The Legion realizes that the present Director of the Veterans' Bureau inherited many faults and weaknesses in personnel and organization, in spite of which the bureau is now functioning more efficiently than at any time heretofore. But after careful examination of the problem, the committee of the American Legion has come to the unescapable conclusion that there is lack of coordination, unnecessary delay, and failure to keep the director correctly advised, thus creating a system which is intolerable.

I believe from personal official experience and investigation that while decentralization may have some advantages, these adverse criticisms of the bureau from these and other sources are in many instances well founded and that the faults complained of are due in great measure to the so-called decentralization plan adopted by the bureau, by which information and data relative to disabled ex-service men, such as their physical and mental condition, the evidence as to their claims for disability, and so forth, are filed in the many regional offices of the bureau, and that these most important facts are not on file at the central office of the bureau at Washington, and therefore not accessible to the people's Representatives at the Capitol except after long-drawn-out correspondence between them and the bureau and between the bureau and the regional offices. As an example of unnecessary delay, I cite the following case:

I initiated, under date of December 17, 1923, a request for investigation and report on the case of Harry Knopke, 243 Laconia Street, Elmhurst, Long Island, N. Y., whose father claimed dependency. There were exchanged 85 letters, and an unfavorable report was received on December 18, 1925, this covering a period of approximately two years, this being due chiefly, I believe, to the delays and red tape incident to the system mentioned.

HOSPITALIZATION

With the enactment of the World War veterans' act on June 7, 1924, it was anticipated that there would be a material increase in the number of admissions to hospitals during the year over the previous year, and also in the total number of patients in these hospitals at any one time. This expectation was borne out by experience, which showed that the total of 76,812 admissions, including the neuropsychiatric and all other groups, exceeded the admissions for 1924 by 16 per cent, although in fact this number was less than the total admissions for the fiscal years 1921, 1922, and 1923. With this increase in yearly admissions, there naturally resulted an increase in the hospital load, which mounted from a total of 21,730 to a peak of 30,753 during February, 1925, subsequently subsiding to 26,610 on June 30, 1925.

Under paragraph 10, section 202, of the World War veterans' act, providing for general hospitalization regardless of origin of disability, approximately 17 per cent of these were veterans of wars other than the World War.

The policy of hospitalizing to the greatest extent possible in Government hospitals is being continued. The trend in admissions during the past several years is significant. In the fiscal year, 1920, 45 per cent of the total admissions were to State and civil hospitals; in 1924 this percentage was 19.36 per cent; and in 1925 it had been reduced to 10.87 per cent. The results accomplished under this policy have been made possible through the carrying out of the permanent hospital construction program of the bureau.

The increase in Government hospitalization obtained for all types of disease, neuropsychiatric cases increasing during the year 1925 from 72 to 78 per cent, tuberculosis cases from 80 to 85 per cent, and general cases from 93 to 96 per cent.

At the commencement of the fiscal year 1925, 44 per cent of all patients in all bureau hospitals were suffering from neuropsychiatric conditions, 39 per cent from tuberculosis, and 17 per cent from general conditions, whereas, at the end of the fiscal year, these percentages were 46, 36, and 18, respectively. Of the net numerical increase during the year in all types of patients under treatment, the greatest increase was in neuropsychiatric cases, which cases increased from 9,929 at the commencement of the year to 12,139 at the end of the year. These figures indicate clearly that from the standpoint of hospitalization and custodianship the most important future problem will be in connection with the neuropsychiatric cases. This is substantiated by reference to the chart (No. 3) accompanying the Veterans' Bureau report for 1925, showing the periodic variation of patients in all hospitals; and that while the general and tuberculosis cases decreased from the peak in February by some 1,000 and 2,000 cases respectively, the neuropsychiatric cases since the peak have shown but a slight decline.

Increased hospitalization in Government facilities were made possible during 1925 through the completion of hospitals previously authorized by Congress.

Congress has been especially generous in the matter of hospital construction, having authorized since the World War total appropriations of $3,214,775,000 for hospital construction and maintenance for veterans' disability compensation, for life insurance or so-called adjusted compensation, and for all other Government activities in the interest of ex-service men and women of the World War the appropriations for hospital construction alone amounting to $58,595,000.

I, as a physician and a Member of the House who has taken a deep interest in this legislation, can truly say that Congress has always promptly and sympathetically met every demand in its power for the proper hospitalization and care of the veterans of the World War and other wars in which the United States has participated.

At the commencement of the fiscal year 1925 there were 15,861 beds available in all United States Veterans' Bureau hospitals, classified as follows: Neuropsychiatric, 5,203; tuberculosis, 6,510; and general, 4,148.

Of the 5,332 beds in general hospitals there are some 966 beds for neuropsychiatric cases and 906 beds for tuberculosis cases. The setting aside in general hospitals for neuropsychiatric and tuberculosis cases obtains in all general hospitals, and is due to the fact that prior to permanent hospitalization a bureau beneficiary is admitted to a general hospital for observation and diagnosis. Furthermore, emergency cases of this character frequently arise, and space must be immediately available to take care of them pending the making of available facilities for their care in hospitals specifically established for them.

In addition to the facilities made available by hospitals under the immediate jurisdiction of the United States Veterans' Bureau there are 9,824 beds made available through other Government agencies, including the War Department, Navy Department, national homes for disabled volunteer soldiers, the Public Health Service, and St. Elizabeths Hospital, Washington, D. C., these services furnishing 2,665, 2,370, 3,322, 534, and 933 beds, respectively, representing 41 individual hospitals. Of these 9,824 beds in other Government hospitals 3,130 are for tuberculosis cases, 2,214 for neuropsychiatric cases, and 4,480 for general cases. Thus it will be seen that in all Government hospitals, including those under the direction of the United States Veterans' Bureau, there was available on June 30, 1925, a grand total of 30,479 beds, representing a net increase for the fiscal year 1925 for all Government beds of 5,469.

It is estimated that all the hospital projects contemplated will have been completed or be under actual construction by June 3, 1927, and that this completed program will give the United States Veterans' Bureau a total of approximately 22,100 beds, exclusive of those in the other departments mentioned, according to the latest report (1925) of the United States Veterans' Bureau, making a total of all Government beds approximately of 31,924:

The general conditions of these hospitals in which these insane veterans are housed are good. The bureau's hospitals for the psychotic, with very few exceptions, are fireproof buildings, with outside rooms, light, airy, and well screened. Inspections made by the Veterans' Bureau reveal that the institutions are neat and orderly, the patients are bathed, shaved, and well cared for, the food is of good quality and well prepared.

Reports from the neuropsychiatric hospitals indicate a fortunate minimum of serious epidemic diseases among their patients and personnel. All possible precautions are taken, such as frequent examination of food handlers for typhoid, dysentery carriers, and venereal infection. There was practically no malaria reported. Every effort is being exercised to prevent and attempt to delay regression and ultimate deterioration in the insane. The institutions have classes in habit training which result in a noticeable improvement in the patient's deportment, tidiness, and cooperation. Occupational therapy is a part of every institution.

The interest of the patient is aroused in various manual pursuits, such as gardening, farming, pig and poultry raising, and some inside shopwork, such as basketry, weaving, leather and metal work, and carpentry. Some activity and interest is kept alive in the patients through athletics, the most popular being volley ball and group calisthenics. Religious services are held at all these institutions and through the able assistance of various organizations, such as the American Red Cross and the Knights of Columbus, etc., many diversions are offered, such as concerts, vaudeville shows, motion pictures, and dances. The medical officers in charge of the hospitals are frequently responsible for such innovations as monthly birthday parties for those whose birthdays fall within the month. All recognized aids in the treatment of these cases, such as hydrotherapy, electrotherapy, physiotherapy, etc., are available in the hospitals.

At the close of the fiscal year, June 30, 1925, there were 54 regional offices, 11 suboffices, and 80 medical-treatment stations in operation. Depending upon the claimant load at these regional offices and suboffices, there was operated by the medical service at each one of the following standard types of dispensaries:

Class A consisted of a complete unit, comprising clinics in internal medicine, general surgery, tuberculosis, neuropsychiatry, ophthalmology, diseases of the eye, ear, nose, and throat, urology, orthopedics, physiotherapy, dentistry, six chairs, X-ray clinical laboratory and pharmacy, with facilities for administration and social service, occupying approximately 8,500 square feet of floor space.

Class B consisted of a similar unit in which the surgical clinic embraces urology and orthopedics. The dental clinic had two chairs instead of six, and the section of physiotherapy was omitted, the floor space occupying 4,216 square feet.

Class C consisted of clinics in medicine, surgery, and eye, ear, nose, and throat, with a small clinical laboratory, one dental chair, and an X ray, if X-ray contracts justified its establishment, occupying 2,352 square feet.

MEDICAL SERVICE

The medical activities of regional offices and suboffices include the making of physical examinations, including spinal examinations (X-ray laboratory analyses and tests of blood, urine, feces, spinal fluid, etc.), and the furnishing of care and treatment (including hospitalization, out-patient relief, follow-up nursing, dental, prosthetic and orthopedic appliances, etc.). In addition, the medical activities at regional offices (not at suboffices) includes a detail of trained physicians as medical members of claims and rating boards. The medical care and treatment furnished by the bureau is carried beyond regional offices and suboffices into the claimant's community and home. Follow-up nurses operating under direction of the regional medical officer and the suboffice medical officer, and guided by a card index in these offices giving the names and addresses of all beneficiaries requiring special periodic contacts, work out from these offices into remote sections of the country where transportation is primitive and travel laborious and difficult. In addition, under the liberal authority conferred by General Order No. 308, wide provision is made for treatment of beneficiaries by designated examiners and private physicians, under supervision of the regional offices. This brings the service to the beneficiary who is too ill to travel to a bureau hospital or dispensary, or when, by reason of comparative inaccessibility, it is more advantageous and less expensive to arrange for locality treatment rather than to travel the beneficiary into a field station of the bureau.

Previous to the enactment of the World War veterans' act of 1924, service disabilities could not receive out-patient treatment, as they now do under this act.

In order to offer facilities for the examination and treatment of beneficiaries who, because of employment necessities, were unable to attend the dispensaries during regular hours, arrangements were effected during the past fiscal year for evening-hour clinics at such stations as in the judgment of regional managers this special service was considered necessary. This service was at first mandatory, but after some months of experience it was found that the number of persons presenting during the additional evening-clinic hour was too small to warrant its continuance, so that the arrangement was made optional with the local offices concerned.

During the past fiscal year, the administration of United States veterans' hospitals was continued under the direct supervision of the medical service, central office, thereby insuring a uniform policy and control that could not otherwise be realized. Regional managers have jurisdiction over contract hospitals in their respective territories.

The supervision of United States veterans' hospitals is effected through three divisions of the medical service—general medical, tuberculosis, and neuropsychiatric—each under a chief who has had special training to fit him for his position. Under the medical director and in cooperation with the construction division of supply service, these officers decide upon questions of location, construction, closure, equipment, and operation of the types of hospitals (general medical, tuberculosis, or neuropsychiatric) under their jurisdiction; they advise in the formulation of a hospital program; transact correspondence, approve personnel and equipment requests, supervise hospital allocation to regional offices and recommend approval of requests for extraregional hospital transfers, and review and recommend acceptance of contracts and leases of contract hospitals.

The most eminent specialists of the communities in which the hospitals are located are engaged as consultants in order that the patient and the resident staffs of the hospitals may have the benefit of expert advice and assistance. A fairly high grade of nursing, dietetic, and reconstruction service, by selection of persons with the requisite training and experience who are attracted by the salaries offered by the Government, is maintained.

Emphasis has been placed during the past fiscal year upon the hospitalizing of such beneficiaries as would be benefited thereby and discharging patients who have received the maximum benefit of hospitalization. As a part of this program, especial attention has been paid to the receiving wards, where the incoming patients are placed for observation and examination, which include complete physical, serological, and, whenever indicated, X ray, hydrotherapy, electrotherapy, physiotherapy, and in selected cases psychotherapy.

Supplementing the thorough physical examination of the patients upon admission, another examination is made before discharge, so that there may be no dissatisfaction on the part of the patient, and full information can be given to the rating boards in the regional offices in order to expedite adjudication of the disability claims.

The educational programs are not limited to the personnel but include the patients themselves. This is particularly true in regard to diabetic, tuberculous, and trachomatous cases, where the patient's care of himself is of the utmost importance.

NEUROPSYCHIATRIC HOSPITALS

The 16 neuropsychiatric hospitals now operated by the bureau are serving fairly well the beneficiaries and are endeavoring to effect rehabilitation by modern methods.

The making of an early diagnosis as soon as possible has resulted in expediting claims, and the present policy of having the claims and rating boards from the regional offices visit the hospitals has worked out satisfactorily in securing an expedited adjustment of claims.

The neuropsychiatric activities, presenting as they do so many complex considerations and requiring a highly specialized administration, are perhaps the most important in the medical service. From the very nature of these ailments, embracing mental as well as neurological cases, hospitalization and custodial care are required in a very large percentage of them at some time during their contact with the bureau. As one gets farther away from the cessation of the war, there are more and more of these whose disabilities have been continuous since discharge, who will not recover. This is particularly true of those afflicted with the chronic deteriorating types of psychoses (insanities). They will require custodial care in an institution the remainder of their lives; and, in the majority of instances life expectancy will not be materially lessened by reason of their mental state. It can be seen, then, that these cases will be cumulative in institutions for an indefinite number of years. Clinical laboratory facilities are provided in each of the neuropsychiatric hospitals.

COMPENSATION DISABILITY

As a result of the provisions of section 200 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, extending the period of presumption of service connection of neuropsychiatric diseases to January 1, 1925, there has been a material increase in the number of permanently disabled insane entitled to care and compensation. These cases have in many instances been beneficiaries of the various States, cared for in State institutions, and the burden of their care has now been changed to the bureau.

The care of honorably discharged veterans of prior wars suffering from neuropsychiatric ailments, in accordance with section 202 (10) of the act just mentioned, will further tax the capacity of this special type of hospital. From the very fact that hospitalization plays such an important part in the care of these patients, the activities of this branch will of necessity embrace the activities of these hospitals.

There has been a consistent endeavor on the part of those in charge of this work to place, in so far as possible, all such cases on a permanent basis of compensation. Surveys of bureau and contract hospitals, examinations by boards of specialists, and special review of the cases in the central and regional offices have been made. As a result, all those showing a progressive mental disease, without remission, and exhibiting other manifestations which make it reasonable to suppose they will be totally disabled for the remainder of their lives, have been placed on permanent total ratings. In other instances, where the disability is not total but represents a somewhat fixed point of progression toward possible recovery, an appropriate permanent partial rating has been made. These cases are largely represented by peripheral nerve injuries, residuals of gunshot wounds, and other trauma, which at this time have become sufficiently removed, with respect to time from the date of the infliction of the original injury, to class them as having reached maximum improvement.

While it is appreciated that the majority of insane beneficiaries will require hospital care for an indefinite number of years, the fact has not been lost sight of that remissions occur, permitting patients to return to their communities from time to time, and in some instances even to resume their former activities in society. To this end every effort has been exerted to prevent any attempt to delay regression and ultimate deterioration in the insane. Occupational therapy has been an integral part of each institution. Cooperation and interest of the patient have been sought in various manual occupations in which his interest can be aroused. Such diversions as basketry, weaving, leather work, toy making, gardening, chicken raising, and bee culture, farming, and so forth, have been utilized. At one hospital 90 per cent of the patients were busy at some period of the day with a type of occupational therapy work. More and more effort along this line is constantly being made, benefit has been derived even in those cases apparently deteriorated. Instances in which spontaneous interest has been aroused have been followed by notable improvement in deportment, tidiness, and cooperation in patients whose intellectual level approaches the vegetative stage.

In addition to these procedures, largely in the domain of occupational therapy, reports show that each and every institution has had the able assistance of the American Red Cross, the Knights of Columbus, and other organizations in organizing and carrying out diversional entertainments for the benefit of the patient. Hospitals were equipped with radio and also with a library for patients and personnel, including a collection of medical works for the staff. To offer facilities for the examination and treatment of beneficiaries who, because of employment necessities, were unable to attend the dispensaries during regular hours during the past fiscal year, evening-hour clinics at such stations as in the judgment of regional managers have been held.

The average period of hospitalization for insane patients could not be based upon the Veterans' Bureau's experience, for many patients of this class have been continuously in the hospital since the close of the war and are still in the hospitals under treatment. However, of those patients who have through discharge attempted social readjustment the total average hospitalization has been 450 days. Probably the best estimate as to the necessary hospitalization for this group of patients is to consider that all those who have a chronic deteriorating type of psychosis will require custodialship care in institutions the remainder of their lives; and since in most instances the life expectancy will not be materially lessened by reason of this condition, the average hospital load, as indicated above, may be expected to be under hospitalization for an indefinite number of years, their average age now being 33 years.

The problem of handling the total neuropsychiatric group lies principally with the regional offices which are more or less constantly in contact with the men of this class who are not under hospitalization. There are 33,170 such claimants not under hospital care at this time.

DIVERSIONAL OCCUPATION

Diversional occupation in general applies with particular force to patients suffering from nervous and mental diseases.

In so far as practicable, all bureau hospitals have had the advantages of local consulting specialists to whom problem cases have been presented. The institutions are equipped with modern operating-room facilities and both minor and major operations are performed, including nose and throat work, by the part-time and full-time specialists. The value of this consulting service is twofold—it benefits the patient requiring it as well as the resident staff, who derive stimulation and counsel from these eminent specialists.

There has been freedom from any serious epidemic diseases.

OUT-PATIENT TREATMENT

Out-patient treatment and supervision of patients who have returned to the community have been instituted and extended during the past year. These clinics have been maintained in Veterans' Bureau hospitals where they are sufficiently accessible to make this practicable, and at other times where not so practicable. They have proven of inestimable value, particularly those in association with hospitals. A check is maintained on the patient's adjustment in the community; sympathetic advice is given; symptoms of recurrences are noted in their incipency.

The total number who have registered for vocational and educational rehabilitation is 335,643.

The total number who have entered training is 179,951.

The total number of disabled veterans of the World War, as of September 30, 1925, was 216,261, of which number 47,216 of the total had some neuropsychiatric disorder.

There have been 298,176 hospital cases since July 1, 1919, to September 30, 1925, 15,210 of which were psychotic, of which number 248 were discharged from the hospital as "recovered" and 3,726 discharged "benefited." A most notable and unfavorable feature of these figures is the fact that the number of definitely psychotic cases discharged as recovered was only 248 out of a total of 15,210, a percentage of recoveries of approximately 1.75, which is far less than that percentage of recoveries in any of our public and private institutions for insane persons drawn from the nonmilitary population. The low recovery rate may be due in part also to the larger number of insanities among veterans caused by serious trauma of the cerebrospinal system and also to neuropsychiatric conditions exclusively incident to the World War, the most complex of the psychoneurotic conditions.

The difference in the figure for the hospitalized psychotic cases and the total compensable psychotic claimants, is simply indicative of a series of interrupted hospitalizations for many of these men. It is difficult to give any definite figures with regard to the direct or indirect causes of insanity of the World War veterans, particularly with reference to shell shock. Shell shock itself is not a disease entity, but is considered as a reaction to fear. The term is vague and is connected not only with psychotic conditions, but also with neurotic ones, some of which are due to hardships and influences of warfare, and others are due simply to the emotional stress of war. The Adjutant General of the Army made no effort to segregate the shell-shock cases, preferring to place them under a more scientific diagnostic term; however, the Veterans' Bureau attempted to use the term shell shock as a causative agent, but found it used so loosely as to make data obtained therefrom unsatisfactory. The bureau has no statistical data available on the subject of shell shock.

There are 47,216 neuropsychiatric ex-service men who are receiving compensation, 8,603 of whom are definitely psychotic or insane.

It has been found that the military population was 58.89 per cent of the total male population of a certain age group, and a comparison of these same age groups in institutions for the insane shows that the military population is 60.12 per cent of the total male population so hospitalized. One of the reports used was compiled by the United States Census Bureau, the other by the United States Veterans' Bureau. The use of similar nomenclature of diseases and conditions by the two bureaus allows this comparison. The slight difference in these percentages would indicate that the insanities among the ex-service men are largely the insanities of every-day life and are not distinguishable from those suffered by nonservice men in the communities. The insanities of ex-service men are the insanities of every-day life, in no way distinguishable from those suffered by nonservice members of the civil communities. The history of State hospitals for insane has been one of steady overcrowding; and inasmuch as the potential load of beneficiaries entitled to treatment in the bureau's neuropsychiatric hospitals embraces, through the provision of section 202, subsection 10 of the World War veterans' act, as amended, all honorably discharged veterans of the Spanish-American War, Philippine insurrection, Boxer rebellion, and the World War, without regard to service connection, a steady increase in Government hospital beds for these cases would seem necessary, in direct proportion to the normal ratio of insanity resulting from the stress and strain of their daily pursuits and the exigencies of modern civilization.

THE POLITICAL SITUATION

There was no objection.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks, I insert the following speech delivered by myself last night over the radio:

I am delighted to have this opportunity to briefly express my views on the political issues of the day. Ever since that patron saint of democracy, Thomas Jefferson, gave expression to the maxim the Democratic Party has stood for that immortal principle, "equal rights to all and special privileges to none." The Republicans have been candid with reference to this principle. They have been frank. They have been truthful. They have never subscribed to the doctrine of "equal rights to all and special privileges to none." They have never proclaimed it, they have never practiced it, they have never pledged themselves to practice it; in fact, they have persistently ignored it, and therein lies the fundamental difference dividing these two great parties. The Democrats do not believe in taxing one class of people to enrich another, and especially do they protest against the policy being practiced by this administration of denying relief to the agricultural industries of this country while extending it in bountiful supply to others. The Democrats believe that so far as possible every industry should stand on its own responsibilities, but this does not mean that we would fail to recognize the conditions of any industry becoming so distressed as to merit legitimate Government aid. The Democrats do not believe in sectional prosperity, nor do they believe in class prosperity. They are committed to a general prosperity falling equally on all sections and classes in the country, and since agriculture is the basic industry of our country we do not believe there can be any permanent general prosperity throughout the land until agriculture is made prosperous. Evidence of this may be found in a comparison of the Democratic and Republican administrations.

Beginning on March 4, 1913, we experienced six years of Democratic administration in all the branches of this Government. Many of you will recall the conditions of that period. Everybody was prosperous. Not only manufactured products but raw materials brought an adequate price on the market. Livestock was high. Wheat was high. Cotton was high. Every man and every woman was able to get work at good living wages and there were two purchasers for almost everything anybody had to sell. The trouble the merchants had during that period was in getting goods. They did not care how much the goods cost so long as they could get the goods. The railroad trains were overloaded with freight and passengers and never before in the history of the world, certainly not in the history of our generation, was there such universal and general prosperity throughout the land. Our country was in fact so prosperous that the people seemed to get frightened or dissatisfied about it, and for some unknown cause in the fall of 1918 they "smote the hand that had fed them" and voted for a change in both legislative branches of our Government.

The change took place on March 4, 1919, when a Republican House and Senate were installed. Soon thereafter cotton, wheat, cattle, and all other products of the farm and ranch fell below the cost of production. The railroads, while charging much higher rates, were carrying fewer passengers and less freight. Factories and industrial institutions began to lead a hand-to-mouth existence. Millions of men and women anxious to work were out of employment, and for the first time in five years beggars and almshouses began to appear on the streets of our cities. More than 2,400 bank failures took place within a period of five years. According to the figures of our Agricultural Department, the value of farm land and equipment throughout the entire country was reduced from $79,000,000,000 to $59,000,000,000. This falling off of $20,000,000,000 makes a reduction of more than 25 per cent in the value of the agricultural assets of our country.

Our Republican friends undertake to explain this difference of a general prosperity during our last Democratic administration and the depression and destitution under the present Republican administration by one single sentence. They assert that those prosperous Democratic days were due to our participation in the war. They asseverate this brief rejoinder with all the conclusion and finality of dictum, but they do not tell you that we did not get into the war until April, 1917.

The war came to an end November 11, 1918. The Republicans have been in full control of both legislative branches of the Government since March 4, 1919. They have been in complete control of every branch of the Government since March 4, 1921. What have our friends to say about the deplorable condition of agriculture in this the good year of 1926, almost eight years after the close of the war? How do they explain that after more than five years of uninterrupted Republican control of all the branches of the Government they have failed to restore any measure of their boasted prosperity to any agricultural section of this country, and still call upon the farmer to sell his commodities below the cost of production?

There may be some intermittent indications of business resumption in certain manufacturing sections, but even these are only isolated cases and no evidence whatever can be found of a return to prosperity in agriculture or in agricultural sections, and certainly no general prosperity throughout the Nation.

What is the matter with agriculture? What is the matter with business in the agricultural section? In my opinion the answer can be found partially in the high protective schedules of the Fordney-McCumber tariff act and partially in the refusal of the present administration to recognize the deplorable situation in the agricultural sections while providing relief for others. It is bordering on a tragedy that these conditions have been permitted to drag along with no serious attempts to provide substantial aid. Ah, but my opponents will say, "We can not legislate to relieve the farmer without indulging in class legislation, and you know that would be a violation of the Constitution." Let me ask my friends what became of your objections to class legislation when you passed through the House the so-called ship subsidy bill intended to give millions of dollars of the people's money to a class known as ship operators? Where were your principles on class legislation? Where were your constitutional objections when you passed the Fordney-McCumber tariff act, forcing farmers and all others in the country to pay tribute to the special interests protected by the excessive rates? If it be class legislation to respond to the distress of the agricultural industry, then why was it not class legislation to respond to the demands of the ship operators and tariff barons?

We must not criticize without proposing some remedy; and yet I have no faith in cure-alls. I indulge no vain hopes for a single specific, but I believe this situation might have been considerably relieved and prosperity gradually restored to our agricultural sections by doing a number of things, none of which would violate sound economics or even smack of class legislation.

First we should have gone to the source of the thing by rearranging the personnel of the Federal Reserve Banking Board so as to place a few members on that tribunal in sympathy with the producers and not altogether in sympathy with those who finance the producers. We have been sadly wanting in a well-defined, consistent foreign policy which would tend to stabilize and maintain real foreign markets for our surplus farm products. We should have looked to the prosperity of our own American farmers rather than devoting all our energies to relieving the peasantry of Europe. A rigid retrenchment and real economy in all the expenditures of public money by the Federal Government, State government, counties, and municipalities in order that we might have an actual, substantial reduction of taxes which would reach the agricultural sections as well as others. We should have a tariff revision reducing the rate on steel, on iron, on textiles, on sugar, and many other high schedules of the Fordney-McCumber Act, which piles up the cost of living so high on the agricultural sections of the country. A reasonable readjustment downward of freight rates, especially as they relate to transportation of agricultural products. Continue every possible and legitimate agency for supplying adequate credit to agriculture. Extend every legitimate aid and encouragement to farm cooperation, and create a high-grade commission of experts to look into the causes of the difference between the prices received by the farmer for his products and the price paid by the consumer, with a view to taking up the slack and eliminating some of the cost of distribution between the producer and consumer.

On the second day of next November an election is to be held to determine which of the two major parties shall control the two legislative branches of the Government for the next two years. What will the people do about it? What will the people do about those who have put upon them a discriminatory tariff law which annually extorts from the American public from three to four billion dollars, which takes from agriculture an amount variously estimated at from $500,000,000 to $1,000,000,000, yet giving agriculture in return only $125,000,000? What will they say of a prohibitive sugar tariff which takes annually $140,000,000 from the American housewife in order that the sugar barons might have an additional profit of $92,000,000? What will they say of discriminatory freight rates which take each year from agriculture more than from any other products of the country? What will they say of an Interstate Commerce Commission fixing these rates which is composed of 11 members with but one member on the commission who lives in and represents that enormous section west and southwest of the Missouri River? What will they do about an administration that has consistently failed to recognize the deplorable condition of the basic industry of our country? With due regard to our eastern friends, to whom we will always be fair and just, what will the people say of a national administration that seems to regard the Western States as mere provinces maintained for the single purpose of fattening the prosperity of certain favored classes at the expense of the masses and woefully impoverishing others?

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, the Committee on Agriculture having the call. The Clerk will call the committee.

The Clerk called the Committee on Agriculture.

SPLENETIC FEVER AMONG LIVESTOCK

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Calendar No. 91, the bill (H. R. 9833) to amend section 6 of the act of May 29, 1884, creating the Bureau of Animal Industry, by striking out the proviso in section 6 of said act.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa calls up the bill (H. R. 9833), which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9833) to amend section 6 of the act of May 29, 1884, creating the Bureau of Animal Industry, by striking out the proviso in section 6 of said act.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of Congress approved May 29, 1884 (48th Cong., 1st sess., ch. 60), establishing the Bureau of Animal Industry in the Department of Agriculture be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the proviso in section 6 of said act, which reads as follows: "Provided, That the so-called splenic or Texas fever shall not be considered a contagious, infectious, or communicable disease within the meanings of sections 4, 5, 6, and 7 of this act as to cattle being transported by rail to markets for slaughter when the same are unloaded only to be fed and watered in lots on the way thereto."

SEC. 2. That all laws or parts of laws in conflict with this act be, and they are hereby, expressly repealed.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] a question. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. There seems to be some misunderstanding, Mr. Speaker. This is a House Calendar bill, as I understand, and therefore the debate will be limited by ordering the previous question, so that if gentlemen wish to agree as to time they can do it now; otherwise the previous question will be ordered when the gentleman from Iowa is ready.

Mr. HAUGEN. May I inquire if any time is desired on the other side?

Mr. ASWELL. No.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. One of the most valuable services rendered by this Bureau of Animal Industry was the distribution of black-leg vaccine to farmers over the country. But the bureau for the last three years has discontinued that distribution. While the gentleman is amending this act, why does he not take care of that situation? That saved thousands of calves for the farmers of the country, at very little cost to the Government. Would the gentleman mind taking care of that proposition in this bill?

Mr. HAUGEN. The suggestion of the gentleman would hardly be germane to this bill.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. That proposition could only come from the Committee on Appropriations. There is already an authorization by Congress for that, but the Committee on Appropriations declines to make an appropriation. The rules do not permit its consideration here. It is a matter of discretion with the Committee on Appropriations. They declined to make any appropriation.

Mr. MADDEN. The committee after looking into the matter came to the conclusion that so little expense was attached to it that the farmers could buy it for themselves.

Mr. BLANTON. They can buy it, but they can not get the right kind. The former distribution greatly helped the small farmers of the United States. I intend to urge before the Committee on Appropriations the resumption of that distribution and try to get them to make appropriation for it.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL].

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand how the time is to be divided.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. None of us can understand it, Mr. Speaker, in the confusion.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes; I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana, who, I understand, in turn yields 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Louisiana yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. ASWELL. Yes; I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, when the Bureau of Animal Industry was created in 1884 that law prohibited the shipment in interstate commerce of cattle infected with communicable or contagious diseases, but there was a proviso placed in the act as a proviso to section 6 which says splenic or Texas fever in cattle shall not be considered a communicable or contagious disease within the purview of the act when cattle are being shipped from a tick-infested area to market for slaughter.

In 1884, when this act was created, very little was scientifically known about the tick, and it was not known at that time that this splenic fever was a communicable or contagious disease. It is agreed now by all authorities on the subject that it is highly contagious and communicable. Therefore, this provision in the act saying that it is not communicable is a legislative falsehood, because the disease is communicable.

For twenty-odd years the Southern States and the Department of Agriculture, through its Bureau of Animal Industry, has been advocating the repeal of this proviso, for with this proviso in the law the Federal Department of Agriculture has no authority to make rules and regulations prohibiting the shipment of cattle from tick areas in interstate commerce. They have no authority to make any regulations for the shipment of cattle from infested areas to free areas. The result of it is that frequently States that are free from the tick are reinfested by the shipment of these cattle in interstate commerce.

The law requires the railroads to unload and feed and water cattle within 28 hours in shipment, and when they are being shipped they are unloaded in stock pens, and these pens become infested with the tick. When a carload of cattle is being shipped for dairy purposes or for pasture, or mules or horses are unloaded in these pens, the cattle or stock so unloaded and fed are common carriers for the tick, and they become infested, and when the cattle or mules or horses are shipped out through the United States into tick-free areas those areas become reinfested.

The veterinarian of the State of Missouri has written several of the Missouri Congressmen that there have been three reinfestations in Missouri, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADKINS], a member of the Committee on Agriculture, advised the committee that there had been a reinfestation in Illinois.

There appeared before the Agricultural Committee in support of this bill seven State veterinarians from the South, to wit, the veterinarian from Georgia, Dr. P. F. Bohnsen, who was the one who called my attention to the matter, and it was at his instance and request that I prepared the bill; the veterinarians from South Carolina, North Carolina, Florida, Alabama, and Arkansas, and Doctor Mohler, of the Department of Agriculture, appeared. They all unanimously agreed that this bill should be enacted into law if the Congress desired to correct the legislative—shall I say—falsehood saying that this disease was not communicable, and if they desired to protect tick-free communities from reinfestation.

Mr. BOWLING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I will.

Mr. BOWLING. The gentleman referred to the veterinarian of the State of Alabama. I want to say that that particular man is Dr. C. A. Cary, who was born, reared, and educated in the State of Iowa, and he is a graduate of the Drake University of the State of Iowa. He has been at the head of the veterinary department and the department of animal industry in our Alabama Polytechnic Institute for the last 15 years, and he is heartily in favor of this bill, and has so written me.

Mr. CRISP. He so informed the committee and informed the committee of his place of birth and his various activities in connection with this legislation.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I will.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Does the gentleman know what induced the Congress, when this provision was passed, to insert a statement of fact in this legislation?

Mr. CRISP. I do not, I will say to my friend from Illinois; but I presume at that time a very small area of the country was tick free and they wanted to get this bill through to protect the spread of other contagious diseases; and, furthermore, at that time the scientists were not as well posted and advised as to the character of that disease as they are now.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I will.

Mr. WINGO. I want to get some idea of the practical workings. At present, if cattle from one of the nonfree areas of my district are to be shipped to Kansas City they are first driven to a station where they are dipped.

Mr. CRISP. Not under existing law.

Mr. WINGO. I am telling the gentleman what is going on now and has been going on. Last year, or two years ago, they required them to be shipped to Little Rock and dipped there; subsequently they established a station at Mena and one at Van Buren, I believe, in my district. They can now bring them there, dip them, and ship them to Kansas City. Now, if this bill passes they will not be permitted to do that, as I understand.

Mr. CRISP. I will say to my friend from Arkansas that, of course, I am not going to take issue with him as to facts which obtain in Arkansas, for I am ignorant about the situation there; but I do know that under existing law the Federal Department of Agriculture has no authority whatever to make any requirement for the shipment of these cattle in interstate commerce if they are infested with splenic fever, because the law says it shall not be considered a communicable disease. Therefore the Federal department has no authority to make any rules or regulations controlling the matter. Now, I understand that in Texas—a part of which is tick-free—they have a law requiring that when cattle are shipped from an infested area to a free area in Texas they have to be dipped. They may apply that in your State, as in Texas, to the shipment of cattle in interstate commerce; but it is voluntary on their part, or it is in compliance with some State law on the subject, because the Federal Government has no authority whatever to prescribe any rules or regulations which will control the matter. Any regulations by the United States Department of Agriculture on the subject would be void.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman is speaking about the Texas cattle tick?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. And the gentleman says there is not and has not been for several years any authority in the Federal Government to control this matter?

Mr. CRISP. There is none to-day.

Mr. WINGO. Well, under what authority, if any, does the Federal Government, through this bureau under Doctor Mohler, undertake to control and inhibit the driving of cattle from Polk County, Ark., across the Oklahoma line into McCurtain County, Okla.?

Mr. CRISP. I do not know that he does that, and he has said that he has no authority to do it.

Mr. WINGO. However, it is contended he has done it; and if so, it was done without authority of law.

Mr. CRISP. I think there is no authority of law for it, and I understood him to say before the Agricultural Committee in advocacy of this bill that they have no authority whatever in the premises now and could not do anything. As to the Texas situation, where intrastate shipments are controlled and regulated under the Texas law, he said he was impotent on account of this very proviso.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Under the Texas law one dipping is required when there is a shipment for immediate slaughter. As I understand from the attitude of the Agricultural Department, that has been done under the authority of the State, and that the Federal Government has no authority whatever to prescribe the character of dipping; but under this bill, as I understand, an amendment will be offered which will provide that the dipping shall be under the supervision of the Federal authorities, which will be more effective, I think.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. CRISP. I will say to my friend from Texas that after the Committee on Agriculture had unanimously recommended a bill, a distinguished gentleman from Texas, representing the cattle industry, came before the Committee on Agriculture in opposition to the bill. I was invited to be present. I stated to the committee I was not an expert in such matters as this; that I had no desire whatever to work any injury or injustice to the cattle raisers of Texas or of any other State; that I wanted to protect my own State and the other tick-free States from reinfestation; and that I would agree to any amendment of the bill that Doctor Mohler, of the Bureau of Animal Industry, recommended. I am advised that some of the distinguished Texas Members of this House, in connection with this distinguished attorney from Texas, have been to Doctor Mohler and have discussed the matter, and an amendment has been prepared which will be offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES]. The amendment is perfectly satisfactory to me, and I shall vote for the gentleman's amendment. [Applause.]

This amendment simply provides that until 1928 the Department of Agriculture can only require one dipping before the cattle are shipped to slaughter. After 1928 that exception expires and then the department can make such rules and regulations as it sees fit for the shipment of the cattle just as the department makes rules and regulations for the shipment of diseased plants, and so forth. This will give the infested areas two years to clean up. In the meantime no harm or injustice is done them, and I shall ask the House to accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES], which I understand is satisfactory to the Texas delegation.

Mr. GARNER of Texas and Mr. HUDSPETH rose.

Mr. CRISP. I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER].

Mr. GARNER of Texas. If the gentleman will permit, I would like to say in that connection that the amendment can not be said to be entirely satisfactory to the Texas delegation, but it is the best we can get and we will have to acquiesce in it. I think myself—

Mr. CRISP. I am sure my friend would not want to injuriously affect my State and three-fourths of the United States, northwest and south, that are tick-free, by having them reinfested.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I want to say to my friend that we are just as anxious to get these ticks eradicated as the gentleman or anyone else, but, of course, we would like an opportunity to ship our cattle to market for immediate slaughter until we can get these ticks eradicated.

Mr. CRISP. This amendment will permit that.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. It is just possible that by 1928 that situation will have arrived.

Mr. CRISP. This amendment does that, and I am for the amendment.

Mr. HUDSPETH. If the gentleman will permit, I will state that the amendment not only has the indorsement of the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry, Doctor Mohler, but the Secretary of Agriculture also indorses the amendment.

Mr. CRISP. I am for the amendment.

Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. KETCHAM. Before the gentleman concludes, will he state the attitude of the State veterinarians that appeared before our committee?

Mr. CRISP. Every one of them was heartily in favor of this bill and indorsed it, and every one of them advised the committee that if this bill passed, in their own States, they would accept the shipment of cattle into their States if they were shipped in accordance with inspections and rules and regulations provided by Doctor Mohler or by the United States Department of Agriculture. Many cattle shipped from these areas are not now permitted to be unloaded in these States, but these veterinarians say that if this bill is passed and regulations are promulgated by the Department of Agriculture, they will accept cattle coming from infested areas into their States.

Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman also state that the amendment which is to be presented by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] is a committee amendment?

Mr. CRISP. I understood that, but—

Mr. JONES. I was just going to call attention to the fact that this is a committee amendment.

Mr. CRISP. But not being a member of the Committee on Agriculture, I did not know that myself. I know when I was before the committee, the committee expressed the hope we could agree on something, and I am agreed. [Applause].

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment as a committee amendment at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES: Line 2, page 2, after the word "thereto," insert the following proviso: "Provided, That until May 1, 1928, cattle infested with or exposed to cattle fever ticks may be shipped in interstate commerce for immediate slaughter after one dipping in accordance with such regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture may prescribe."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, this amendment has the unanimous indorsement of the committee, and it also has the indorsement of both Secretary Jardine and Doctor Mohler, of the Department of Agriculture; in fact, after conference with those who are interested, it was drafted by Doctor Mohler, and I would like to have the privilege of placing his letter in connection with it in the Record.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record in the matter indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to follows:

APRIL 13, 1926.

Hon. GILBERT N. HAUGEN,

House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. HAUGEN: Referring to the department's letter to you of March 24 concerning bill H. R. 9833, introduced February 27, 1926, by Mr. CRISP, which seeks to amend section 6 of the act of May 29, 1884, creating the Bureau of Animal Industry, further consideration has been given by the department to this matter, and in order to allow the cattle industry a reasonable period of time in which to adjust itself to the changed conditions which would be brought about by the enactment of this bill into law, I now have to suggest that a provision be inserted in the bill permitting the interstate shipment until May 1, 1928, of cattle for slaughter after one dipping. This might be accomplished by adding the following language after the word "thereto," in line 3, on page 2 of the bill, as introduced by Mr. CRISP, and inserting in lieu thereof the following proviso:

"Provided, That until May 1, 1928, cattle infested with or exposed to cattle fever ticks may be shipped in interstate commerce for immediate slaughter after one dipping, in accordance with such regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture may prescribe."

Sincerely yours,

W. M. JARDINE, Secretary.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman from Texas yield for a question for information?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WINGO. As I understand, the effect of the gentleman's amendment will be this: It will give them until May 1, 1928, in these infested areas to get cleaned up. In the meantime, and until that date, they may, subject to regulations, ship cattle in interstate commerce for immediate slaughter after they have been dipped once.

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. And then if these areas are not cleaned up by that time such cattle will not be permitted to be shipped at all?

Mr. JONES. They will not be except under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture. The Secretary will prescribe such regulations as he deems necessary to take care of the situation. It will then be up to the department.

Mr. WINGO. With his judgment on the matter, the Secretary would feel impelled to do that.

Mr. JONES. He probably would feel impelled to take such steps as he thought would be effective.

Mr. WINGO. The chief object of this is to give the infested areas two years to clean up; and if they are barred after that, it will be their own fault.

Mr. JONES. In a measure, yes; men have bought their cattle, fattened and handled them on the faith of the law as it is. To make such a law immediately effective would entail untold losses. This, as the gentleman suggests, would give them two years before the law takes full effect.

Mr. ADKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. ADKINS. The thing your people were afraid of was the fact that if this amendment was not put in the department might impose unusual regulations such as dipping twice—

Mr. JONES. Yes; and even a third time. They could do it and they could require such a dipping as would make them unfit for sale and almost unmarketable if they were to be shipped for immediate slaughter. This would mean ruin to many owners of cattle if required at once and without chance for adjustment.

Mr. ADKINS. You want to prevent unwarranted regulations?

Mr. JONES. Yes; we want to require but one dipping, which is sufficient to prevent any chance for the spreading of the disease in cases of shipment for immediate slaughter.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman knows that it is necessary to dip the cattle over 10 days or 2 weeks; that the ticks germinate and come out again.

Mr. JONES. We had in the amendment that they must be shipped within 72 hours of the dipping, but Doctor Mohler suggested that we leave that as a regulation. They can make it 72 hours or 48 hours or such other time as they find necessary.

Mr. HUDSPETH. If properly dipped, there is not 1 case in 500 but that one dipping will kill the ticks.

Mr. McDUFFIE. What happens at the end of two years if they have not cleaned it up—they could not ship them at all.

Mr. JONES. They can not ship them except under such regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture may find necessary.

Mr. LOZIER. During the two years' time which they have to clean up is not there grave danger that areas now free from the infection may become infected?

Mr. JONES. No; where the cattle are shipped for immediate slaughter after dipping in a solution approved by the department there will be no danger of infection.

Mr. LOZIER. If one dipping will take care of it for two years, why will it not take care of it permanently?

Mr. JONES. This measure covers cases in which cattle are shipped for immediate slaughter, and the Secretary of Agriculture wants to work toward the end of absolutely eliminating the whole trouble, both in the infested zones and without the infested zones. He wants complete control after the time is given for adjustment with reference to the law at present and as proposed.

Mr. LOZIER. Does not this amendment suggest or propose that the free areas be held open and subject to this menace for two years?

Mr. JONES. They would be under the law as it is now. They could not require even one dipping, and there would be danger if there was not this one dipping. Where one dipping is had, as the amendment provides, and the cattle shipped for immediate slaughter there is no danger. That is the universal experience of the cattlemen.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. Does not the gentleman think it would be better to make it four years instead of two?

Mr. JONES. We endeavored to get that concession, but we could not get it. This is the best we could get after conference with the department.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. It will be almost impossible for us to clean up in two years.

Mr. JONES. In all the States, and especially in my State, great effort has been made, and two-thirds of the State is without the quarantine zone.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will call attention of the gentleman from Texas to the words "in lieu of the matter stricken out." The bill itself strikes out the language.

Mr. JONES. My amendment goes to the end of the matter stricken out. My amendment does not strike out anything. I leave the language of the bill as it is, but I will ask to modify it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the amendment of the gentleman as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 2, page 2, after the word "thereto," insert the following proviso in lieu of the matter stricken out.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I think we are getting the bill balled up. Why would it not be better to offer it as a separate section?

Mr. JONES. I do not think it is necessary to say "in lieu thereof" at all, because I do not strike out anything. I think the amendment in its original form was better.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I think the original proposition the way the amendment was prepared was the best way to offer it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment as originally offered.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES: Line 2, page 2, after the word "thereto" insert the following proviso: "Provided, That until May 1, 1928, cattle infested with or exposed to cattle fever ticks may be shipped in interstate commerce for immediate slaughter after one dipping in accordance with such regulations that the Secretary of Agriculture may prescribe."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ASWELL) there were—ayes 135, noes 13.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote upon the ground that there is no quorum present, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 307, nays 26, not voting 98, as follows:

SUGAR IMPORTED FROM ARGENTINE REPUBLIC

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 358) authorizing the President to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to adjust a transaction relating to 3,500 tons of sugar imported from the Argentine Republic.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa calls up the bill H. R. 358.

Mr. LA GUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against the bill that it is a private bill in its character and it can not be considered in any other light; that under the rules it should be on the Private Calendar and should come from the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, it has been as far back as Speaker Crisp, and all the way down in an unbroken line of decisions, that if a question is raised before a committee to which a bill has been improperly referred, reports the bill the Speaker would have to sustain the point of order, but it has been held, as I say, in an unbroken line of decisions that where a committee which has no proper jurisdiction of a bill is allowed to report the bill, then it has just as much power and authority to report it as would a committee where no question is raised in respect to it.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from New York makes the point of order that the bill is a private bill, and, therefore, should be on the Private Calendar.

Mr. BLANTON. If it went on any calendar, having allowed the Committee on Agriculture to assume jurisdiction over the bill and to report it, then the chairman of that committee on Calendar Wednesday can call up the bill from his committee.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Speaker, this bill is not a private bill. The Committee on Agriculture has always reported bills pertaining to this sugar equalizing board, and it has that authority.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is prepared to rule. If this were the first instance of one of these sugar bills being reported from the Agricultural Committee and going on the Union Calendar, the Chair would seriously question whether the bill should not be on the Private Calendar; but bills similar to this, on a number of occasions heretofore, going back several years, have been considered and reported by the Committee on Agriculture and have gone on the Union Calendar. Under these circumstances the Chair thinks he must overrule the point of order.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Were points of order made on those bills on former occasions?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not had time to investigate, but the impression of the Chair is that the point of order has never been raised before.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 41) to encourage and regulate the use of aircraft in commerce, and for other purposes, and requested a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had named Mr. JONES of Washington, Mr. FERNALD, Mr. BINGHAM, Mr. FLETCHER, and Mr. RANDELL as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

WATSON SUGAR CLAIM

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, I have a point of order I desire to make to a portion of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill has not yet been reported. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is authorized to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to adjust with Robert A. Watson, of South Orange, N. J., a certain transaction entered into and carried on by said Watson under the direction of the Department of Justice, which transaction involved the purchase in the Argentine Republic between the 11th day of June, 1920, and the 30th day of June, 1920, of 3,500 tons of Argentine refined sugar, the importation thereof into the United States, and the distribution of the same within the United States, and to require the said United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to liquidate and adjust the entire transaction in such manner as may be deemed by said board to be equitable and proper in the premises, paying to the said Watson such sums as may be found by said board to represent the actual loss sustained by him in said transaction, and for this purpose the President is authorized to vote or use the stock of the corporation held by him, or otherwise exercise or use his control over the said United States Sugar Equalization Board and its directors, and to continue the said corporation for such time as may be necessary to carry out the intention of this act.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against that portion of the bill beginning on line 6, page 2, with the word "paying" after the word "premises," through the remainder of the bill. I do this upon the ground that the bill in effect is seeking to appropriate money. Paragraph 4 of Rule XXI, provides as follows:

No bill or joint resolution carrying appropriations shall be reported by any committee not having jurisdiction to report appropriations, nor shall an amendment proposing an appropriation be in order during the consideration of a bill or joint resolution reported by a committee not having that jurisdiction. A question of order on an appropriation in any such bill, joint resolution, or amendment thereto may be raised at any time.

From the footnotes I read the following:

The term "appropriation" in the rule means the payment of funds from the Treasury.

Language reappropriating, making available, or diverting an appropriation or a portion of an appropriation already made for one purpose to another is not in order.

Now this bill seeks to authorize the President to direct the Sugar Equalization Board not only to settle with Watson, but after the settlement is made to pay him, of course, out of the sugar equalization fund, which, of course, if not all expended, will revert into the Treasury; and therefore it is in effect taking money out of the Treasury. On that I hold that the Committee on Agriculture under this rule has no right to authorize this appropriation or even authorize the President to direct the equalization board to make this settlement and then pay out of the equalization fund whatever amount may be due. I do not think the Committee on Agriculture has the power to do it under the rules of the House that I have just cited to the Speaker.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Yes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. It makes no appropriation out of the Treasury or reappropriation out of the Treasury. The Sugar Equalization Board is a stock corporation organized under the Government for certain purposes and having stock of its own. This bill authorizes the payment by the corporation of this claim out of its assets. The bill as drawn, providing for such payment, was referred by the House to the Committee on Agriculture and was reported by that committee.

Mr. KINCHELOE. The gentleman says it is not to be paid out of the Treasury. Where would the assets of this equalization board go when its affairs are wound up? Would it not be to the Treasury?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I might say for the information of the Chair or recall to the recollection of the Chair that there is a $30,000,000 profit, and this profit never came out of the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman this question: Was the same provision carried in the other bills?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes; it was.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I do not think the point of order was raised against them.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, adding further to what the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] has said, I have a letter written within a few days from Assistant Secretary Winston, in which he says there has been recovered in the equalization board $30,000,000, and that they are holding back over $12,000,000 for the purpose of settling these claims. It certainly can not be said that this is an authorization of the payment of money out of the Treasury. This is like two other bills that have passed the House.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It seems the Sugar Equalization Board in this bill comes under the same category as the Panama Railroad Co., that being a corporation in which the United States owns all the stock, and it owns all the stock in this equalization board. Query: Could any money be paid either by the Panama Railroad Co. or the Sugar Equalization Board without authority from Congress?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I think the statement of the gentleman answers the point of order, because the Panama Railroad Co. continually, in the ordinary course of business, makes payments that are not appropriated for by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I am asking it just to raise the question. It seems to me the two organizations are analogous.

The SPEAKER. It appears to the Chair that this money arises from the profits made by the corporation.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Certainly, Mr. Speaker; and as the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] pointed out, the money by the direction of the Treasury itself remains an asset of the corporation for the express purposes of this bill.

The SPEAKER. And this payment would have no connection with the Treasury?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Certainly not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Can the Chair base his ruling on anything except the record in the case?

The SPEAKER. The point of order is that this is an appropriation, and that the Committee on Agriculture has no authority to report an appropriation. The Chair does not think it is an appropriation or taking money from the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I understood the Chair that he was predicated his decision on assurances received by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] and the gentleman from New Jersey that the Treasury did decide that this money had not been put into the Treasury. The Chair, however, must take cognizance of the statute and the facts and constructions in this case. According to the statutes, all the stock of this corporation is owned by the Government. According to the statute all this money is in the Treasury of the United States. It is not deposited in a bank.

The SPEAKER. This money is not a part of the Treasury funds. This money was made by the corporation in the ordinary transaction of business, and amounts, as the Chair understands, to about $30,000,000, which is owned by the corporation.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The Chair can not, however, understand or assume anything that is not in the record. This money is now in the Treasury of the United States. It may be there to the credit of the Sugar Equalization Board, but it is physically in the Treasury, and it can not be withdrawn from the Treasury except as authorized by law; and, being in the Treasury, whenever you take it out of the Treasury you are making an appropriation of that money.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the gentleman from Texas, he says the Chair is not in possession of the record. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] called attention to the record. The record in this instance is the books of the Treasury and the books of the corporation.

They show that this money belongs to and is in the possession of the corporation. Would the gentleman hold, in accordance with his argument, that the retirement fund, made up of contributions by the employees for the purpose of paying for their retirement, being in the physical possession of the Treasury, therefore belongs to the Treasury as its own funds? The mere presence of the money in the Treasury does not make it the property of the United States Government.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask this question: If these funds are not the funds of the Government of the United States, why is it necessary for Congress to pass a law directing that this payment be made?

If those who manage the Sugar Equalization Board have the right to pay this claim, and if it is a meritorious claim, and if they think it ought to be paid, why is it necessary to come here and ask Congress to pass a law directing that it be paid? I can not see any difference between a bill of this sort, directing the Sugar Equalization Board to make this payment out of funds that evidently belong to the United States Government, and a bill directing the Secretary of the Treasury to make a payment out of funds not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I will.

Mr. LEHLBACH. This corporation, the Sugar Equalization Board, was created by an act of Congress which circumscribed the powers and the functions and activities of the board. At the time that these functions were created by the act bringing the board into existence this situation was not anticipated, and consequently its general powers do not cover this specific situation. For that reason Congress has repeatedly—and is considering the same proposition in this instance—vested this specific power in the board, a power which is not covered in its general powers which, as I say, were circumscribed, and did not take this settlement into consideration.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Let me ask the gentleman this question: Those funds, if they are not expended under resolutions of this kind, belong to the Government of the United States, do they not?

Mr. LEHLBACH. They do not belong to the Government of the United States as yet.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Well, they in effect belong to the Government, and is there any difference in principle between directing the Sugar Equalization Board to make this payment out of these funds and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to make it out of funds not otherwise appropriated?

Mr. LEHLBACH. The funds do not belong to the Government until the Sugar Equalization Board goes into liquidation. At that time, under the law creating the board, the money is paid into the Treasury. Now, if the gentleman suggests that because this money may eventually belong to the Federal Government—admitting that at present it does not—and says in principle that is the same as appropriating money, he is discussing the merits of the proposition and not the point of order.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I yield.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The Sugar Equalization Board has always had authority to consider and adjust these claims. This claim has been before the Sugar Equalization Board; they considered it altogether without merit and refused to pay it. This is one of three claims that came before the Committee on Agriculture two or three years ago and were given some consideration. One was by the American Trading Co., one was by a man named De Ronde, and this one. It was decided by the Committee on Agriculture that there was considerable merit to the American Trading Co.'s claim, and a bill was reported and put through the House providing for its adjustment. There was more doubt as to the merits of the De Ronde claim, and it finally slipped through the committee, but not on its merits—and I say that without reflection on the committee—but simply because the other one had gone through. It came here and was passed by the House by one majority. The President signed the American Trading Co. bill, but refused to sign the De Ronde bill, and it became a law without his signature. If he were other than the President of the United States, I presume Mr. De Ronde would have tried to mandamus him and compel him to submit the claim to the Sugar Equalization Board for adjustment, but a mandamus would not run against the President of the United States. Therefore Mr. De Ronde had no relief even after his bill was passed, and, as I understand it, he has gone into the courts now to try the case on its merits.

Now, I said the Sugar Equalization Board had considered these matters, and this is what happened: When they considered the American Trading Co. claim—the one that had the most merit in it—the board divided equally; therefore they could not make the adjustment, although Mr. Glasgow, who was the chairman of the board and its legal adviser, believed that the claim ought to be paid, but under the circumstances he said the only thing to do was to go to the Congress.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is another thing in regard to the manner in which these bills were drawn.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order in order to make this inquiry: Has the Chair ruled on the point of order and are we now discussing the merits of this bill?

The SPEAKER. No. In view of some statements made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], the Chair has postponed his ruling.

Mr. LEHLBACH. All of this has nothing to do with the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to be enlightened on a question of fact. The Chair finds this language in the bill:

The President is authorized—

And so forth—

and to continue the said corporation for such time as may be necessary to carry out the intention of this act.

Does that mean that this board is now a defunct organization?

Mr. LEHLBACH. No.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. They still have a legal existence, but they are not operating.

The SPEAKER. Are they such an organization that they have in their custody a sum of money out of which it is proposed to pay this claim? Is that a fact?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. They have in their custody a certain amount of money; yes.

The SPEAKER. If that be the fact, the Chair thinks that this is not an appropriation in the sense of its taking money out of the United States Treasury, and therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I rose primarily to say that the Sugar Equalization Board did have original jurisdiction and it has jurisdiction now to consider this claim. It has considered it and has refused it, and this is a direction of Congress to allow it.

The SPEAKER. That has nothing to do with the point of order raised by the gentleman from Kentucky. The Chair has now ruled upon the point of order, and the House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union—

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. If this bill from the Committee on Agriculture is in order, would another bill restoring to the wheat farmers of the United States the $75,000,000 which was made by the United States Grain Corporation be in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not consider that a proper point of order.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Will it be necessary to have an agreement about the time for general debate before going into committee?

The SPEAKER. No; the rules of Calendar Wednesday will obtain.

Mr. JONES. If more than our hour on the side is wanted, it will be necessary.

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The Chair started to say that the House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of this bill. Why is that necessary?

The SPEAKER. That is necessary under the Calendar Wednesday rule. Where a bill is reported from the Union Calendar, the House must automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with the further provision that there shall be not to exceed two hours of general debate.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Is it not true the reason this bill is on the Union Calendar is that it carries a charge on the Treasury? Bills making appropriations or charging the Treasury or tax bills are the only ones required to be on the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. That may be true. The bill is on the Union Calendar as have other bills previously been on that calendar, and being on the Union Calendar the Chair has no recourse.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The Chair ruled, however, when the point of order was made that this was a private bill, that it was not a private bill.

The SPEAKER. The Union Calendar also contains bills authorizing appropriations and not necessarily appropriation bills.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. It is evident there is not a quorum present.

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House. A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and forty Members have answered "present"—a quorum.

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 358) authorizing the President to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to adjust a transaction relating to 3,500 tons of sugar imported from the Argentine Republic, with Mr. CHINDBLOM in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KETCHAM]. I am for the bill, of course.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, if I may have your attention for a few minutes I will try to set before you two or three vital things which I think ought to be considered in this case.

In the first place, I want to state who the representative of the United States Government was who figured in this case and with whom the agreements and arrangements were made by Mr. Watson, who is before the House with this claim.

From page 24 of the hearings that were held before the House Committee on Agriculture under date of January 6, 1925, and at which hearings appeared Arnold W. Riley, former special assistant to the Attorney General, I read this statement as to his own activity and his own relations to this claim.

Mr. Riley states that during the time of the war he was special assistant to the Attorney General in charge of the investigation and prosecution of violations of the Lever Act, the so-called profiteering act. As time went on ultimately to him was assigned the responsibility of looking after the distribution of sugar and the control of the sugar under the arrangement we had at that particular time. In this connection, Mr. Riley says:

Ultimately, because of the fact that practically all the refineries were located in New York City, I opened a branch office in the post-office building in New York, in the early part of 1920. I spent most of my time there, although I still had my office in the Department of Justice in Washington and spent one or two days a week here.

Further, he says, speaking of conferences that were held between himself and various persons who desired to import sugar:

At different times I had conferences with the representatives of the sugar industry. They attended a conference with the Attorney General in Washington, and he referred them to me in the future for matters in connection with sugar.

I think that will establish from Mr. Riley's own testimony the place he had in relation to all these matters that came into the discussion of this particular case. I think no one reading the testimony of Mr. Riley will dispute but that he was the final authority and spoke the last word so far as the Government was concerned in the case.

Now, so far as Mr. Watson is concerned, he is a man who for many years has been engaged in the general business of wholesaling sugar and probably other products. Those of you familiar with the situation will recall at that particular period after the close of the war the supply of sugar was limited, and you recall the outrageous height that the price of that commodity reached. In my section of the State I think it ran as high as 30 cents a pound in one or two instances. Of course, all the powers of the Government were used to skirmish around and find where there were world supplies of sugar and bring them in. But those interested in doing that particular thing, either from the standpoint of profit or otherwise, found themselves face to face with the provisions of the Lever Act, and so they came to the Department of Justice to see what arrangement might be made for the importation of sugar.

Mr. Watson was one of that number. He came and talked with the authorities here and they, as the letter indicated, referred him back to Mr. Riley, who had his headquarters in a Government building in New York. He conferred with Mr. Riley as to the terms and conditions under which he might be permitted to bring in and sell and to whom he might distribute 3,500 tons of sugar. After a little informal conversation going over the matter Mr. Watson goes back to his office and prepares the memorandum, incorporating in it the understanding he had reached with Mr. Riley, the representative of the Government. I want to read from a letter one sentence written to Mr. Riley:

Some days ago this situation was fully discussed with your department in Washington, and the difficulties arising under the Lever Act seemed to be such as to make it inadvisable for me to pursue the matter further, but the great shortage of sugar in this country and the need to take measures to relieve the same has caused me to take up the matter anew with you in order to see if the transaction can be consummated. I am therefore laying the matter before you again for consideration, after an informal discussion with you to-day. I am prepared to do my best to carry the transaction through, provided your department will write me a letter giving its sanction to the importation of sugar from Argentina upon the following conditions:

1. Upon the basis of the present cost price to me of refined Argentine sugar, approximately 17½ cents per pound c. i. f. American ports, I propose to market the sugar at not exceeding 20 cents per pound.
2. Should the cost price to me of refined Argentine sugar change, my sale price would increase or decrease proportionately, as the case may be, so that the sale price might be either greater or less than 20 cents per pound, dependent upon the cost price to me.
3. I agree to permit your office to designate the channels through which this sugar shall be distributed, provided that the ultimate purchasers satisfy me as to their financial standing and as to the terms of settlement.

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHAM. I have only 10 minutes. Please get this point: To show the absolute fairness and the whole-hearted sincere desire of Mr. Watson to play square, later on he was informed that he might purchase this sugar at 1 cent a pound less than the price quoted here, and he immediately said to those above him:

I will give the consumers the advantage of that 1 cent.

When he was not required to do so. I make that statement in absolute proof of his sincerity.

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question on that particular point.

Mr. KETCHAM. I can not yield. Third, I want this condition to get into the minds of every member of the committee:

I agree to permit your office to designate the channels through which this sugar shall be distributed, provided that the ultimate purchasers satisfy me as to their financial standing and as to the terms of settlement.

I think, my friends, that that is a pretty fair agreement between the representative of the Department of Justice and the man who was attempting to relieve a very serious situation in the United States under these critical conditions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I might state that the date of this letter from which I have read was June 19, 1920. We do not need to depend upon any informal understanding between Mr. Riley and Mr. Watson, but we have this definite letter from Mr. Watson to Mr. Riley, and I want Members now to listen to Mr. Riley's reply, written under date of June 23, 1920:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., June 23, 1920.

ROBERT A. WATSON, Esq.,

Care of the Nafra Co. (Inc.), 120 Broadway, New York.

DEAR MR. WATSON: This is to confirm our various conversations and in reply to your letters of June 19 and 23, 1920.

In view of the fact that the sugar requirements of the people of this country are in excess of the supply now available and in order to encourage the importation into this country of foreign sugars, you will be permitted to import the sugars mentioned upon the terms set forth in your said letters.

You are further informed that if you carry out the department's requirements as to price and distribution as so set forth, no prosecutions under the Lever Act, as amended, will arise therefrom.

Yours very truly,

ARMIN W. RILEY,
Special Assistant to the Attorney General.

If that does not make a fair and square case of an agreement between the authorized representative of the United States Government and the man who desires to carry out that contract in good faith, I do not know how to interpret the English language.

Mr. MADDEN. I was just going to ask the gentleman the question which he has answered, whether or not he considers that a contract.

Mr. KETCHAM. Not in a legal sense, and the committee is not bringing this before the House of Representatives upon the theory that there is a legal obligation, but we do bring it upon the high ground of right and justice and morality, the things that would bind you and me if we were entering into a sacred obligation of this kind. In order that you may know that this is carried out in good faith I want you to note just one other statement, and this is from a letter from a man named Boyd, who had been appointed as chairman of the Cannery Supply Co. (Inc.), which was the active governmental institution organized at the behest of Mr. Riley for the purpose of having directly in charge the distribution of this sugar.

Please note this very brief statement. This is a letter to Mr. Watson:

CANNERS SUPPLIES CO. (INC.),
New York, July 23, 1920.

Mr. WATSON, Esq.,

New York City.

DEAR SIR: Relative to the sale of one car lot of 60,000 to 80,000 pounds of Argentine grade A granulated refined sugar to F. B. Lovelace, of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., at 21 cents net per pound f. o. b. car New York, would advise that I have just written acknowledging this order, and in consideration of your reducing the price of this sugar to 19 cents net per pound f. o. b. New York, I have quoted a price to Mr. Lovelace of 20 cents per pound f. o. b. New York.

Will you kindly note this order on your books and oblige,

Very truly yours,

CANNERS SUPPLIES CO. (INC.),
By JAMES BOYD, President.

Here again is a Government representative speaking. I call attention to the fact that that Government representative takes down a profit of 1 cent per pound, if you please, to be put into the funds of this Sugar Equalization Board.

Mr. BROWNE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHAM. Yes.

Mr. BROWNE. Does the gentleman mean to say that Mr. Watson paid 18 cents a pound down in Cuba for this sugar?

Mr. KETCHAM. Not in Cuba.

Mr. BROWNE. Is it not a fact that the producers of that sugar did not get over 5 cents a pound?

Mr. KETCHAM. This was produced in Argentina.

Mr. BROWNE. In Cuba or in Argentina.

Mr. KETCHAM. I am not able to say. I only know what he paid for it.

Mr. STEPHENS. Under what law or provision could this Government representative take 1 cent a pound?

Mr. KETCHAM. This was under those very extraordinary powers exercised during the time of the war.

Mr. STEPHENS. It went into the Government Treasury?

Mr. KETCHAM. It went into the pockets of the Sugar Equalization Board, and I may say now that there may be no question about whether or not that board now has any funds, I called the Treasury Department this morning and found that to the credit to the Sugar Equalization Board, and under that name, in the Treasury of the United States there is to-day $12,954,780.45, which represents what still remains of the profits from the transactions of that board.

Mr. STEPHENS. In what fund is that?

Mr. KETCHAM. In this particular fund in the Treasury to the credit of this board.

Mr. STEPHENS. Then it would be fair to take out of that fund enough money to pay Mr. Watson for his losses?

Mr. KETCHAM. What his losses were.

Mr. STEPHENS. Would that money that would come to Mr. Watson come out of that particular fund?

Mr. KETCHAM. It would. But it is money that is not yet in the Treasury of the United States, it is in charge, nominally, at least, I think we may say legally, of the United States Sugar Equalization Board. I, of course, do not want to attempt any legal discussion, but I can not forego the privilege of reading one sentence from the decision of Judge Morris, who had the De Ronde case before him, and who was the one who granted the injunction against the closing up the business of the Sugar Board of Equalization. In the course of that opinion, with reference to the De Ronde case, he made this statement:

Moreover, the plaintiff is, in my opinion, entitled to have the amount of his actual loss in the transaction ascertained and paid.

That was the judgment of the court, and it is interesting to note that in the decision of the United States court of appeals the decision of the district court granting that injunction was affirmed on August 10 of last year.

So, gentlemen of the committee, I may say this, and I think probably this statement ought to be made: The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] made a statement that this claim, together with others, had been considered and had been declared to be unworthy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman one additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for one minute more.

Mr. KETCHAM. I think it is fair to say that this so-called Watson claim was not one of the claims to which reference was made by the gentleman from Michigan. Speaking for myself, I may say that having listened to the testimony, pro and con, I believe for myself that this claim is grounded in equity, and by all that is fair and square between men and men and between the Government and individual citizens, it seems to me that Mr. Watson is entitled to compensation. He lost every dollar that he had in the world in trying to meet competition.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHAM. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS. Was this bill introduced in the last House?

Mr. KETCHAM. Yes; it was.

Mr. STEPHENS. But never came up for consideration?

Mr. KETCHAM. No; it never came up for consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has again expired.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I regret that I am so busy this afternoon that I shall not be able to remain here to hear all of this debate; but I want to say now, once for all, no matter what may be said, that I am against this measure, and for extremely good reasons.

In my opinion it would not stand analysis. This is the third of these claims. I happen to know something about them from information obtained from Captain Lewis, who was himself in the Argentine at the time this game was attempted to be pulled off. In fact, at one time he was a party to it. He was an officer in the Boer War. I know him well. He formerly lived in my district; he is a citizen of the United States. The deal was too raw for him. He was to have made $150,000 for himself on one of these deals, and at one time they paid him, I believe, $50,000 or some similar sum, to get out of the way. They claimed he was in another employ on the side. Perhaps so. It was all wrong, I think. The whole game was to get more money by making an advance price in sugar. [Applause.]

I am speaking from memory as to the amounts in the Lewis end of it. Probably that Argentine sugar deal did not involve the particular sugar deal now under consideration, but as one was bad, I am afraid this one is bad. I have not had time lately to post myself as to the details, but other Argentine sugar claims were up here before. I have lots of information in my files. You remember one of these claims went through both branches of Congress and the President declined to sign it. One was called the De Ronde claim. You remember the De Ronde establishment down here, and how Members were to be run in, with entry. That stuff did not work then, and they do not try it now. If this claim is so good, or if any of these claims are so good, we have the Court of Claims where these various statements that are made might be adjudicated in a court. This could be sent there by special resolution.

This is a claim for $750,000. Why hurry? We have not even considered many much more legitimate war claims yet. Every Member of this Congress knows 15 places where we can spend that $750,000 much more profitably and properly than in the settlement of a very doubtful claim against this Government. We do not have to be in such a hurry to settle such doubtful claims. I hope you will not vote it through. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen of the committee, I have opposed all of these sugar claims that have been presented to this House, because I believe, in the first place, the Department of Justice had no authority whatever to make any agreement with these importers of sugar, and in the next place, even if they had the authority, the circumstances were such that no payments whatever are due, even from the standpoint of good morals, from the Government to these various importers.

However, I want to say in connection with this claim that this gentleman, Mr. Watson, is more modest and fairer in the presentation of his claim than the claimants in any of the other cases that have been presented. He has asked for less than the others, and only for enough to cover his losses. In my judgment he is a gentleman, and was both frank and honest in his statements to the committee. However, inasmuch as my colleagues on the committee are prepared to discuss the details of this claim, I am not going to do so, but I shall discuss just a little of the history of another of these claims, to show you what a mistake Congress made when it went into the payment of the so-called sugar claims which this Congress has acted upon.

This gentleman, whose claim is before us for action to-day, paid 16 cents a pound for his sugar in the Argentine, and he says that the settlement on the basis of 19 cents will pay all the freight, his commission, his insurance and other such charges, and his loss, all totaling 3 cents a pound.

You will remember the famous old American Trading Co. case, which was the big case of this whole series of cases, and the one about which more fight was staged than any of the others, and the one that seemed to have more pull, and which passed this House by a big majority. In that case those men were the first of these importers of sugar. They bought the sugar at 13 or 14 cents.

This Congress allowed them a settlement on the basis of 21.3 cents, or 7.8 cents profit per pound. If this gentleman is asking no less than his losses, then the American Trading

Co. and B. H. Howell & Co. got a profit from the settlement by the Congress of $1,306,000. We all felt at the time that it was a doubtful case and we had evidence that convinced us of that fact, but under a special rule we were allowed only a few minutes for debate, and no chance to fully present the facts. The bill was thus rushed through to a final conclusion. Later developments have proven conclusively that the American Trading Co. was making a profit out of deceiving the committee or undertaking to deceive it or the Congress as to that transaction. Since they secured the money, they have had a lawsuit, which I understand is still pending, if it has not been settled by the profiteers themselves, who fell out among themselves over the swag which the Congress gave them.

Not only that, but there is a man down in Buenos Aires who bought this sugar for the company. You remember the American Trading Co. had an organization down in Argentina, and they bought this sugar from themselves even at 13 and 14 cents a pound. This man is suing them down there for his proportion of the profits on the sugar he sold them or bought for them, which they sold to themselves and on which they took two systems of profit in coming before the Government of the United States. That is one of the series of sugar claims that has been presented to the committee, passed on to the House, and passed by the House.

Everyone is familiar with the fact that the Government by virtue of its action during and immediately following the war caused losses to a great many people. When wheat was $2.50 per bushel the Congress passed a law by virtue of which wheat was reduced from that figure to a point ranging from $1.80 to $2.20 per bushel, and men who had wheat in their granaries and men who had wheat in their elevators had the value of their property reduced in tremendous amounts, and could make a much better claim to the United States Government than any of these sugar claimants can make, even though you concede that they would, generally speaking, have a moral claim against the Government. But in keeping with the usual attitude of Representatives in talking for the farmer and acting against him and in favor of the other fellow the sugar claims are reported.

There are some more facts in connection with this American Trading Co. claim, which in my judgment was an outrage perpetrated against the United States Government. It developed that the men who were interested, the same ones who fought so valiantly for the claim of the American Trading Co., had tremendous sugar interests in the Island of Cuba and elsewhere, and the same directors were interlocking directors in 14 different sugar companies owning plantations in Cuba.

They learned that the Government was going to try to devise some method or have some procedure by which the price of sugar might be made more reasonable, and they apparently conceived the idea of going to the Argentine Republic and getting control of available sugar there—and they pretty nearly succeeded in doing it—in the meantime feeding the sugar from their Cuban plantations to the market here. There was a great supply of sugar notwithstanding their claim of shortage. They knew that the available supply of sugar would break the market. They wanted to get control of the sugar situation. They bought the Argentine sugar, held it back, and did not bring it in for three months; in the meantime they brought in and fed their Cuban sugar to the market, and yet they asked the American Government to pay their losses on their Argentine sugar. It was a gigantic scheme and, in a large measure, has succeeded. It is sad to note that they succeeded in getting the amount of those other claims out of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. In this gigantic scheme of defrauding that the gentleman speaks of, does he mean that the Department of Justice at that time was a party to it?

Mr. JONES. I do not mean that the Department of Justice was a party to it, although I think there were some men connected with the Department of Justice who are not wholly free from blame. But I am not going to discuss the individuals who might be connected with the department or others. I am saying there was a combination of these interests by which they not only did what I said but did one other thing. These sugar people, representing these sugar companies, after they had gotten these contracts tied up in the Argentine, and having control of an abundant supply of sugar in Cuba through their plantations and through other supplies in those islands, went out over the United States, when sugar was 26 and 27 cents a pound—now, mind you, they were telling the Government officials and others that there was a shortage of sugar, and were telling a lot of people in the United States that there was a shortage of sugar—and told them, "You had better buy sugar now; contract for it now." So they contracted over a period months in advance with various retail dealers all over the South and West and in a great many sections of the North and East; they contracted to furnish them sugar, for a six months' supply or a year's supply, at 24 cents per pound. They evidently must have known that sugar was going down when sugar was selling at 26 and 27 cents a pound; otherwise they would not have gone out and contracted to furnish it for 24 cents a pound. They would not have done that if they had not had possession of information which would lead them to believe or know that sugar was going down.

But they got those big contracts. Sugar went down when the big supply came in. They could not keep it out forever. It went down to 8, 10, and 12 cents per pound. Then they sued these individual owners and merchants throughout the United States and made many of them comply with their contracts to buy sugar at 24 cents a pound. That is another side light in their scheme, which succeeded in a great many instances.

Mr. FORT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. FORT. Do I understand the gentleman thinks that Mr. Watson was a party to this conspiracy?

Mr. JONES. No. I do not say that Mr. Watson was; rather I think he was the victim of it; but he was a sugar dealer of 25 years' experience. However, he was in no way connected with the case I am talking about. I want to make that clear. He not only was not connected with it, but I do not believe he would have engaged in such a plan.

Mr. FORT. I think the record shows that this is the only transaction in sugar that Mr. Watson ever had.

Mr. JONES. That may be; but he was in the importing business for 25 years.

Mr. FORT. He was an importer, but he did not deal in sugar.

Mr. JONES. I do not recall whether he handled sugar or not. The gentleman may be correct about that, and I thank him for his statement of correction. But he had been in the importing business for 25 years, and it seems to me that a man engaged in the importing business on a great scale should have known what he was doing. He went to the Government to get in on this thing; the Government did not come to him. That is shown in the hearings on page 26, and it does not seem to me he should have relief unless we are going into payment of all the farmers' claims or losses relative to war activities. While I am more favorably inclined toward his claim than any of these other claims I really do not think the Government is bound, either morally or legally, by any of the claims.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The gentleman from Michigan read a letter from Armin W. Riley, Special Assistant Attorney General, addressed to Mr. Watson.

Mr. JONES. Well, it is agreed in that letter not to prosecute him under the Lever Act. We are not passing on whether or not he is going to be prosecuted under the Lever Act. I would vote to-day not to prosecute him under the Lever Act, and I suppose all of my colleagues would vote the same way. But this is not a case of prosecuting under the Lever Act.

This is a case of paying losses which were sustained by him, and I say that any man who is fair and who has the instincts of justice in his heart and would vote for this kind of a claim should also vote to repay the wheat men, the elevator men, the wheat owners, and wheat growers for the losses which were occasioned by the action of the Government, and which was a legal action during the war and which furnishes a far more just basis for complaint than any one of these claims.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Assuming the Government was bound with reference to this agreement not to prosecute under the antitrust law—

Mr. JONES. I do not like to assume that, but I will assume it for the purpose of the question.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Assuming that to be the fact, which I doubt, would it result that the Government would be either legally or morally bound for any losses that might occur on a contract between these individuals?

Mr. JONES. I do not think so. As a matter of fact, even the claimants themselves admit there could be no legal claim, because there was no legal authority in the Department of Justice to make these so-called contracts. The claimants themselves and their attorneys and those who testified for them universally admitted there was no legal claim and could be no legal claim because of the lack of authority to make a binding agreement, and thus any attempt to do so would be an ultra vires contract. However, that, of course, should not keep us from paying a claim if it is a just one.

Mr. KETCHAM and Mr. LAGUARDIA rose.

Mr. JONES. I yield first to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. KETCHAM. Referring to this very matter, will not the gentleman concede that if Mr. Watson had had a free hand to make contracts before the arrival of his sugar there would not have been any loss.

Mr. JONES. But the very letter the gentleman read showed him in advance that he would have to comply with certain regulations in order to have the privilege of bringing in this sugar, and the gentleman's own letter shows he knew that before he ever bought a pound of sugar.

Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. KETCHAM. Did not the text of that letter prescribe the price at which he would have to sell and the distribution that would have to be made?

Mr. JONES. It only prescribed that he could not sell at above 20 cents a pound, and that he knew also before he bought the sugar.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. As I recall the Lever Act, the only provision of that act under which he might have been prosecuted is the one with respect to profiteering?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. So the Attorney General permitted him to profiteer, as they say, in order to break the price of sugar at 20 cents a pound.

Mr. JONES. That is a matter of opinion.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH].

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to rehearse all the details of this transaction, but I do want to advert to some of the statements that have heretofore been made with respect to this particular claim.

The gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] referred to a Captain Lewis, whoever he may be, apparently a soldier of fortune who fought in the Boer war, but when his own country was at war was down in Argentina; who claims that with respect to this case, as the gentleman from Washington says, he was supposed to have a profit and was offered $150,000, or something of that sort, in connection with this transaction.

I do not know who this Lewis may be, but I can say that Watson bought this sugar in the Argentine for the purpose of carrying out an agreement with the United States Government to bring this sugar to the United States and sell it at a profit to himself of 1½ cents per pound, and before he had that sugar loaded on a vessel in the Argentine the price of sugar in the Argentine went to 23 cents. He could have sold every pound of that sugar in the Argentine at a profit of 7 cents a pound. Now, why was he paying or offering to pay anybody $150,000 for the privilege of bringing that sugar here and taking all the risks in connection with bringing it to the United States and then selling it at a cent and a quarter profit instead of selling it at a profit of 7 cents a pound in the Argentine? There was no Lever Act in the Argentine. He could have sold it for any price he wanted. Why did he not do that? Because he had entered into an agreement as an American citizen with his country to perform a service for his country, and no money could tempt him to swerve from that purpose or from rendering that service. [Applause.]

Buying Cuban sugar, holding back the Argentine sugar, and making a profit on Cuban sugar? Not Watson, because when this transaction was finished there was no profit on Cuban sugar to fall back on, because Watson was stone broke as a result of the transaction.

No agreement? There is no contract which under the statutes can be enforced against the Government of the United States or against the Sugar Equalization Board; but if the same arrangement that the representatives of the Department of Justice entered into with Watson had been made by a private citizen, of course there is a contract and of course there is an enforceable agreement.

The agreement was that Watson should purchase this Argentine sugar, should finance the transaction, should bring it to New York, should pay the customs duties, and then sell it to such buyers of sugar as the Department of Justice designated and to no others, he to make a cent and a quarter per pound profit on the transaction, and the Sugar Equalization Board to make 1 cent a pound profit on the transaction—a joint undertaking under an enforceable agreement against anybody in the world except the Government of the United States.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. What was the Sugar Equalization Board? I do not happen to recall now.

Mr. LEHLBACH. It was a corporation created under a war act for the purpose of enforcing the Lever Act, and for the purpose of securing an equitable distribution of sugar at reasonable prices and to prevent profiteering in sugar. It was a stock company, all the stock of which was owned by the President of the United States. Let me say in this connection that in these undertakings which the Sugar Equalization Board and its agency, the Cannery Supplies Co., directed by the Department of Justice, entered into, the result was they broke the price of sugar from 27 cents a pound to 5 cents a pound, and they saved the consumers of the United States $1,000,000,000 in the cost of sugar, and they turned into the Treasury a profit on their part of the transaction of $30,000,000, and they are still holding back over $12,000,000 of this profit in order to settle this and similar claims. As a result of the joint transaction, while the Sugar Equalization Board made vast profits, they broke this man, and now there is the suggestion that there is no moral or legal obligation; that there is no inherent equity and justice to say that out of these inordinate profits that the Government, through the Sugar Equalization Board, made on the transactions, this man should not be made whole, when his entire loss was due to the fact he lived up to the letter and the spirit of his contract with the Government in every particular.

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I will.

Mr. LOZIER. Does the gentleman contend that there was any agreement on the part of the Government to stabilize and hold the price of sugar at a definite point or to underwrite Mr. Watson against loss on that speculative investment?

Mr. LEHLBACH. This is what the Government undertook to do. The Government undertook to furnish Mr. Watson with a list of buyers of sugar to whom he was to transfer this sugar at a profit to himself of a cent and a quarter and a profit to the Government of 1 cent. Mr. Watson could have sold the sugar at a profit of 7 cents and could have entered into contracts at a much greater profit with buyers in the United States, but refrained under his agreement to sell the sugar to such buyers as the Government designated. He preferred to live up to his agreement with the Government in order to sell to buyers whom the Government might dictate, in order that the sugar might go where it was most needed, and although he importuned the department to tell him where the sugar should go they held back until sugar was 5 cents a pound and he was broke.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. If Watson had a contract with this corporation and agreed to give the corporation a profit of 1 cent that they might furnish him with a list of buyers, why can not he sue the corporation?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Because this corporation is a quasi public corporation, the stock of which is held by the President of the United States and the agreement in behalf of the corporation was made by a special Attorney General, and the statute prescribes what kind of contracts and in what form the contracts must be entered into by an official of the Government with a private person. If this contract was made with a private concern instead of the Government, of course, it would be enforceable in law and could be collected.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The Court of Claims can adjust claims under a contract whether they be quasi contracts or not, can they not?

Mr. LEHLBACH. My understanding is that the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims extends only to claims against the Government of the United States. Now, technically the Sugar Equalization Board being a corporation under a special act of Congress, the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims does not extend—I have not examined the question very thoroughly, but I am informed that that is a fact by gentlemen who have studied it.

Mr. UNDERHILL. It extends to any subdivision under the Government as well.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Not to corporations.

Mr. UNDERHILL. An act of Congress could be had authorizing the taking of this case before the Court of Claims, could it not?

Mr. LEHLBACH. We are simply authorizing the Equalization Board to adjudicate it.

Mr. UNDERHILL. We are directing them to do it.

Mr. LEHLBACH. This Sugar Equalization Board is as competent to adjudicate it as is the Court of Claims, and more so.

Mr. TINCER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. TINCER. The facts are that at the time the transaction was had between the Department of Justice and Mr. Watson the executive heads of the Government had undertaken to break the price of sugar without reference to the Sugar Equalization Board. It ignored the equalization board and undertook to break the price of sugar.

Mr. LEHLBACH. The functions of the various departments at that time were scrambled and mingled together and there was no clear demarcation of the bounds of jurisdiction by reason of the chaotic condition of things at that time.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. The gentleman says that the sugar board was to have a part of the profits of this transaction. The committee report does not show that.

Mr. LEHLBACH. A letter in the hearings regarding the price quoted by Mr. Watson to the Canner's Supply Co., which was another Government corporation, shows that. I will read the letter. It is as follows:

CANNERS SUPPLIES CO. (INC.),
New York, July 23, 1920.

Mr. WATSON, Esq.,
New York City.

DEAR SIR: Relative to the sale of 1 car lot of 60,000 to 80,000 pounds of Argentine grade A granulated refined sugar to F. B. Lovelace, of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., at 21 cents net per pound f. o. b. car New York, would advise that I have just written acknowledging this order, and in consideration of you reducing the price of this sugar to 19 cents net per pound f. o. b. New York, I have quoted a price to Mr. Lovelace of 20 cents per pound f. o. b. New York.

Will you kindly note this order on your books and oblige,

Very truly yours,

CANNERS SUPPLIES CO. (INC.),
By JAMES BOYD, President.

The buyers who were to be designated were to pay 1 cent more than Mr. Watson stated to the Government, so that the result was that in the sale of the sugar to be marketed under the joint partnership Mr. Watson was to profit $1\frac{1}{4}$ cents a pound and the Government profit 1 cent a pound.

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS. I understand this claim arises in this way: The trading company, or Mr. Watson, wanted to buy sugar and bring it into the United States at a profit. It was the question of profit with him and not a question of serving the public.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I will say that Mr. Watson has been an exporter and an importer for 25 years, and he never engaged in a sugar transaction in his experience until this one, and he went into this doing what he was requested to do.

The testimony in some of the other cases shows that meetings were called by the Attorney General, Mr. Palmer, of various exporters and importers. They met here in Washington, and they were urged to import sugar as a patriotic duty.

Mr. BYRNS. But when you get down to rock bottom, are not the facts these, that Mr. Watson saw an opportunity to make some profit on importing sugar from Argentina into this country, and thereupon requested the Department of Justice to give him permission to bring that sugar in here and to make sales of it, and the Department of Justice complied with his request and told him he could bring that sugar into this country under certain conditions and requirements. After he had bought the sugar in the Argentine, the gentleman says that he could have sold it there for a profit of 7 cents; but Mr. Watson did not know that when he was making overtures to the Department of Justice for permission to bring that sugar in. Under those circumstances, the sugar having been brought in here, Mr. Watson having understood the terms and requirements upon which he could bring it in here, the price of sugar having gone down and he having made a loss, why should the people of the United States be taxed because he failed to make his profit and suffered a loss?

Mr. LEHLBACH. For two reasons. In the first place, the gentleman states the facts, but he inverts them. The initiative was not taken by Mr. Watson asking the Government for permission. The initiative was taken, and every Government witness has so testified, by the Department of Justice approaching the importers and asking them to bring in sugar. The second answer is that Mr. Watson had plenty of opportunity when that sugar came into his possession and while in transit from Argentina to New York to sell it at a profit at the price limited by the Government, but according to a further agreement with the Government he withheld it from sale in order to await the designation of buyers by the Government.

Mr. BYRNS. The report of the committee shows, as I read it, that Mr. Watson's testimony was that during the shortage of 1920 he consulted with the Department of Justice, to whom he stated he had made an arrangement to import this sugar.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I just want to say one word with regard to the wording of the letter to which reference has been made:

You are further informed that if you carry out the department's requirements as to the price and distribution as so set forth, no prosecutions under the Lever Act, as amended, will arise therefrom.

The impression is sought to be conveyed that that was all of the agreement there was. Let me call your attention to the fact that that letter was not written in the department, was not written by Mr. Watson, but was written by an attorney in a bank to meet a situation which Mr. Watson had to meet. It was meeting the proposition that they might run foul of the Lever Act. The letter is not inclusive of the entire understanding, whatsoever.

Mr. LOZIER. Is it not true from the letter of Mr. Watson of June 19 that the correspondence was initiated solely with a view of ascertaining the attitude of the Government under the Lever Act in case he imported the sugar?

Mr. LEHLBACH. No; that is not the fact.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 12 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN].

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, this is one of a number of claims brought to the attention of the Committee on Agriculture several years ago, to which as a member of that committee I gave a great deal of attention. This claim has been compared to the claim of the American Trading Co. In explaining why it is not the same, not at all similar, I shall be as brief as possible. The American Trading Co. was employed as the purchasing agent of the Government by agreement between the State Department and the Department of Justice, representing our Government, and the company. The records of both departments are loaded with letters passing between them and the United States ambassador at Buenos Aires, in which they speak of the American Trading Co. as "our purchasing agent," and after the sugar was purchased down there there was some question about it, and the settlement of it was taken up directly by our ambassador with the authorities at Buenos Aires. It was dealt with in correspondence and otherwise by the American ambassador and the American Secretary of State in his letters as "our sugar," the "Government's sugar." Other claimants tried to get in under the same tent with the American Trading Co., so we went to the office of the Secretary of State to see this correspondence and examine his records. I was the chairman of the subcommittee. With me were Mr. Jacoway, of Arkansas, and Mr. Ward, of New York. We saw every paper, and besides we have a letter over the signature of the Secretary of State, Mr. Charles E. Hughes, in which he says that the American Trading Co. was the sole company with which the Government of the United States ever had any such relations as to sugar or any arrangement under which the Government assumed any obligation whatever.

It is said that this claimant made an arrangement with Mr. Riley. What did Mr. Riley do?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I have not the time. I am sorry. What did Mr. Riley do? The Sugar Equalization Board had been organized to function for six months. It had got through. The six months had expired.

In a way it turned over its duties, responsibilities, and authority, properly or not, to the Department of Justice, and Mr. Riley was an employee of the Department of Justice. He undertook to take up their work, and the correspondence between him and Mr. Watson was in that capacity, so far as Mr. Riley was concerned. Here is what Mr. Riley says he imposed upon Mr. Watson:

1. That you keep within what I thought then was a reasonable margin of profit.
2. That you sell to essential industries.

Gentlemen will remember that the department was controlling those essential products, controlling their use, and in a way controlling the price against profiteering. As to the arrangement between Mr. Riley and Mr. Watson when this sugar came in. When Mr. Riley was a witness he testified as follows:

Mr. VOIGHT. And did you attempt to give any direction as to the disposition of that sugar?

Mr. RILEY. On its arrival?

Mr. VOIGHT. Yes, sir.

Mr. RILEY. No, sir.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. You did in some cases, didn't you?

Mr. RILEY. That was before it arrived.

They were prepared to direct this sugar into essential channels—those that most needed the sugar—for the welfare of the country. He says:

That was before it arrived. You see, after it arrived the price was so much in excess of what the market was that it was out of the question for me to do anything, because nobody would pay anything. These names that I had of men who required sugar—they would not undertake to take the sugar at any price, particularly above the market.

Here was the effort of Mr. Watson that has been referred to so often, and which has been stressed so much, that he asked Mr. Riley to give him the names of purchasers. Riley says he learned that Mr. Watson was clamoring for the names of those to whom he might sell sugar. Mr. Riley says:

I told them it was impossible for me to get anybody to take the sugar at those prices. The market was demoralized at that time.

Why was it demoralized? Because incorrect and misleading newspaper reports came to and were published in the United States as to the amount of sugar available in Argentina and the amount that was arranged for to come into this country. When that news was spread abroad in this country the bottom dropped out of the price of sugar, and the price went down, almost if not quite, to 5 cents, when it had been up almost to 30 cents. That is why Mr. Watson would not sell in Argentina when he had a chance to make a large profit.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Was not his contract limited to a profit of a cent and a quarter a pound?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. His opportunity for profit in this country was satisfactory to him, anyway; and he did not care to sell in Argentina. There was no contract or understanding, no obligation on him to bring his sugar to this country against his own interest, or, if he wished, to sell in Argentina. That is the same thing that the American Trading Co. said. That is the same thing that De Ronde said; the same thing that Watson said.

This matter was settled four or five years ago when this man, Watson, had not the nerve to assert his claim. It had no merit and, besides, there were at that time men in the departments, familiar with all facts and circumstances, able to inform and advise the Congress. Now he takes the record of other cases and picks out this and that and the other fact that seems to be favorable to him and makes up the record himself.

This report of the committee is made up of two matters: One is Mr. Watson's statement, solely his statement, in which he puts his own construction upon the correspondence between him and Riley and his own understanding of the conversation between him and Riley, which he assumes to quote five years after the conversations were held; and the only other thing contained in the committee's report is a letter from Mr. Riley directed to Mr. Watson, in which he says:

If you follow our directions you will be permitted to bring in the sugar.

Now, his directions were simply that there should be no profiteering, it being the duty of the Department of Justice to prevent profiteering and extortion, and that the sugar should go to the essential industries, it being important and absolutely necessary so to distribute available sugar that there might be no monopoly or waste, so that it might reach needy and deserving hands. That is all there was to it. There was no obligation, legal or moral, assumed by our Government to insure Watson or anyone else a profit on sugar, no obligation to insure him purchasers except at prices prevailing at the time his sugar reached this country; and, as we know, when his sugar did reach this country the sugar market had broken and no one would buy at his prices or so as to save him from loss.

I have been in this House, Mr. Chairman, a long time and have often differed from officials of the Government as to the moral obligations of the Government, and have often been displeased—very, very much displeased—at the attitude of many of them in refusing to recognize moral obligations. I believe sincerely from my heart that it ought to be impossible for the Government of the United States to do a wrong or mean thing; but the attitude of many of the departments in refusing to recognize moral obligations is, in my judgment, most reprehensible.

I believe in the recognition by our Government of every moral obligation, but I insist that there is not even a moral obligation in this case, and nobody went into these claims more deeply than I did at the time they were presented, when facts and records were fresh. As chairman of the subcommittee, I went through the papers in the State Department, had copies of them made and filed with the Committee on Agriculture. In all papers so examined, everything in the departments, we found nothing to justify this claim. The only one that I judged should be considered favorably was that of the American Trading Co., and the men composing that organization, we are told, are now quarreling among themselves about the division of the money they obtained from the Government.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. KETCHAM. The gentleman stated that nothing appears in the hearing except certain statements of Mr. Watson. The gentleman evidently has not seen the hearings that were held a year ago, in which all these matters were thoroughly threshed out. Several complete hearings were held, with the testimony of several witnesses.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I said there is nothing more in the committee's report on this bill. I have seen the hearings, including the statement of Mr. Watson, which I do not accept at face value. I have also seen the statement of Mr. Riley, which upholds exactly the position I now take. He was trying to enforce the pure food law, and he assured Mr. Watson that there would be no prosecution if he kept within the law. But taking the statements of Mr. Watson at one time and another, I am not willing to accept them without corroborative testimony, and I do not find it. Corroboration is altogether lacking.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KINCHELOE] use some of his time?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, how does the time stand? The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky has 30 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Nebraska has 25 minutes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, I think there ought to be a quorum here. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and three gentlemen are present—a quorum.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Chairman, if I believed the Government of the United States was under any contract of any kind to make Mr. Watson whole in this transaction, of course, I would vote for this bill. Anyone who reads the hearings is bound to sympathize with Mr. Watson in his loss on this transaction. I happen to know of a great many wholesale grocers in this country who lost very large amounts on sugar which they had on hand at the time this price decline took place. Many of them had paid from 22 to 24 cents a pound for this sugar and suffered losses all the way from $8 to $10 per 100 pounds on it before they were finally able to liquidate. In other words, they had to follow the market on down until the sugar was disposed of. I happen to be connected with a wholesale grocery business in a small way and I know that for nearly a year after that price decline began it was impossible to handle sugar without a loss. You would buy a car to-day at the market price and before you could possibly dispose of it the market had declined to levels where you were bound to lose, and for more than a year, or nearly a year, after this price decline began it was absolutely impossible to handle sugar without a loss. Everybody knows that who is familiar with the business.

But that was not true as to sugar alone. It was true as to cotton, as to wheat, and as to meat products. Probably some of you gentlemen who are not familiar with the cotton situation will be amazed when I tell you that within a period of a very few months raw cotton declined from 40 cents a pound to 12 cents a pound, a decline of 28 cents a pound. Now, what happened by reason of these tremendous declines? Many bankers, many business men, and many farmers were wiped off the board, financially speaking, just like Mr. Watson was wiped off the board. But I have not heard anybody proposing that the Government step in and make good their losses.

This tremendous decline has been attributed to many causes. Some have said it was due to a deflation policy of the Federal Reserve Board; some have said it was due to the exhaustion of European credit in the United States in the middle of 1920; while others have said it was due to a buyers' strike, when the public refused any longer to buy at these high prices. Take sugar, for example. The public had seen it go on up from 20 cents to 21, to 22, to 23, to 24, and to 25 cents; then they stopped and said, "We will not buy." It reminds me of a story I used to hear on Governor Hogg, of my State. He went over to the city of London on a visit. He went into one of the hotels there and met the tipping nuisance on every hand. He had to tip the bellboy; he had to tip the waiter; he had to tip the hotel clerk, and everybody else around the hotel. Finally he went up to his room and went to the basin to wash his face and hands, and right above the basin was a sign, "Tip the basin." He said, "By Godlings I will not do it; I am getting tired of this tipping nuisance." [Laughter.] The American public had gotten tired of piling on one price advance after the other, and the buyers' strike as much as anything else brought about this precipitate decline in sugar, and before Mr. Watson could get from under he was a broke man. His situation is not different in that respect from many others, though of course I greatly sympathize with it.

Is there anything in these hearings to show that the Department of Justice agreed to buy 10,000 tons, or any part of 10,000 tons, of sugar from Mr. Watson? No. Nobody will contend that. Is there anything in this record that shows that any officials on the part of the Government guaranteed or undertook to guarantee that Mr. Watson would receive any particular price for this sugar? I can not find it. I have looked in vain for any guaranty of that kind.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. The gentleman will recall that when the other cases of this kind were up the fact was brought out very clearly to the House, as is the case here, that at the time sugar was 27 to 30 cents a pound, and the Government was doing its best to break the price of sugar in the interest of the American public, that nobody thought of a loss, not even the Government itself.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Oh, no; they were not thinking of a loss. Everybody thought these high prices would remain until they could get from under, and that was why so many went broke.

Mr. JONES. They were thinking of the profits.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Let me tell you this: Mr. Watson was thinking of making 2½ cents a pound.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. No; 1½.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Well, there was a spread; he was allowed a spread from 17½ cents to 20 cents.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. And the other party got the 1 cent; the Government got that.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I will convince the gentleman he is incorrect about that in a moment. But here is what he was thinking of. Ten thousand tons of sugar made 20,000,000 pounds, and even at 1 cent a pound profit, if I calculate correctly, it would be about $200,000. Reasonable profits were legitimate and I do not complain about Mr. Watson expecting to make a profit.

Now, let us take Mr. Watson's statement, his own statement, and see whether the Government is either legally or morally bound to pay this claim. Here is his statement, writing to Mr. Riley, of the Department of Justice. He says:

I am prepared to do my best to carry the transaction through, provided your department will write me a letter giving its sanction to the importation of sugar from Argentina upon the following conditions.

Now, listen:

1. Upon the basis of the present cost price to me of refined Argentine sugar, approximately 17½ cents per pound c. i. f. American ports, I propose to market the sugar at not exceeding 20 cents per pound.

Which would be a spread of 2½ cents, which, by the way, is a pretty good spread on sugar.

2. Should the cost price to me of refined Argentine sugar change, the sale price to me would increase or decrease proportionately, as the case may be, so that the sale price might be either greater or less than 20 cents per pound, dependent upon the cost price to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. BLACK of Texas (reading further)—

3. I agree to permit your office to designate the channels through which this sugar shall be distributed, provided that the ultimate purchasers satisfy me as to their financial standing, and as to the terms of settlement.

There was no difference in principle in this agreement than the license that was granted to all the wholesale grocers of the country. Every wholesale grocer, before he could sell a pound of sugar, had to get a license and bind himself that he would not make a larger profit than 1 cent a pound. That was all right. That was high enough and that is all they ought to have had, but the Government did not guarantee that they would not suffer a loss, and, as a matter of fact, as I said a while ago, many wholesale grocers of the United States lost as high as from $8 to $10 and $12 on a sack of sugar.

Mr. FORT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Yes.

Mr. FORT. In the first place, the gentleman understands that the phrase "17½ cents per pound c. l. f. in New York" means unloaded?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Yes.

Mr. FORT. On board ship. Therefore, the 2½ cents spread the gentleman speaks about is not after the sugar is landed but while it is on board ship.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I would like to conclude and I have just one word more to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I merely want to add in conclusion that if the Government is not to make good the loss which thousands of citizens suffered by reason of the heavy price decline, then I do not see why Mr. Watson and a few others should be singled out for preferential treatment. Therefore, I shall feel compelled to vote against the bill.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I hope I may have your careful attention. I realize there are not many votes influenced by debate in the House, but this is a matter which I have gone into very thoroughly, and we are going to decide very soon whether we will authorize the Sugar Equalization Board to adjust the losses of an individual, not a corporation, but a single individual, who was induced to import sugar for the purpose of breaking the market in this country when sugar was high. This man went into the proposition and as a result of the break in the market, which the Department of Justice wanted to bring about, he has lost everything, all of his life's savings, and is out of business. His home has been mortgaged and has been sold for taxes. He has nothing left at all, and he is a man who has reached that age in life when it is impossible for him to start over. That is the reason, gentlemen, I am serious about this matter.

My friend, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN], attempted to explain to you that the American Trading Co.'s claim was the only just claim in connection with these importations. The only difference in the world between the American Trading Co.'s claim and this claim and the other claim that was passed by Congress is this: After going to the Department of Justice, the same as these other gentlemen did, and after having agreed with the Department of Justice to bring in this sugar, Mr. Franklin, of the American Trading Co., then went to the Department of State to try to make arrangements with them to keep from depositing the proportion of pelee sugar, as it was called, that it was necessary to deposit in the Argentine before sugar could be exported from the Argentine. After a series of negotiations, the Department of State did arrange it so the American Trading Co. would not have to expend the money to deposit that pelee sugar. Every other person who went into this proposition had to go down in his pocket and pay his money and put up this pelee sugar because they did not go to the State Department.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. If Mr. Watson had gone to the State Department, would not that department have made the same representations in his behalf?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Absolutely. That is the only difference between the claim the gentleman from Michigan refers to and the Watson claim.

Gentlemen, I want to call your attention for a moment to the history of this Watson claim. The gentleman from Michigan said that this is one of the claims that came up years ago. The gentleman from Michigan told me three days ago when I handed him the report on this matter that he had never heard of the claim before, and asked what it was. That is true, because the claim did not come up until after the gentleman was off of our committee and was on the Ways and Means Committee.

This Watson claim was twice reported unanimously by the Senate Committee on Agriculture, and in the last Congress it passed the Senate by a unanimous vote. There was not a single vote recorded against it. It came out of our committee of the House the other day with a unanimous report. There are three gentlemen who are opposed to it who happened to be absent, but they did not choose to file a minority report.

Mr. JONES. If the gentleman will permit, I will state that I was there and voted against it, but I did not file a minority report.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. I was there and did not hear the gentleman's voice, but I will concede that if the gentleman says he voted no, of course, he did, but the report comes out, as the gentleman understands, as a unanimous report.

As I pointed out a moment ago with reference to the matter of profits and losses that have been talked about, because of the high price of sugar at the time these discussions were on, and when the Department of Justice placed its agency in New York for the purpose of bringing in these importers and inducing them to bring in this sugar to break the price of sugar in the interest of the American people, nobody thought of a loss because of the high price at that time. But what happened when the sugar was on its way? The newspapers came out with statements of this sugar coming in, with reports from the Department of Justice that great quantities of sugar were coming up from the Argentine, and it was such advertising propaganda which broke the price of sugar and brought quantities of sugar out of hiding and forced the price down from 27 cents a pound to 5 cents a pound.

In the case of Mr. Watson the Department of Justice, as is clearly shown, did tell him they would furnish the agencies through which he was to distribute his sugar.

Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman again tell the House about how much the people of the United States saved by this depression of the price of sugar?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. According to the statements of Mr. Figg and Mr. Riley, which were made two or three years ago, it saved the American people over $1,000,000,000 in a single year, and it has been much more than that since.

The gentleman from Texas asks, Should we reimburse men who went broke on this account? I should say yes; when the American people admittedly saved more than $1,000,000,000 the first year the price was reduced. Are the American people not under some moral obligation to the men who entered into arrangements with the Government to break the price of sugar, thereby losing everything they had?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Very briefly.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Would the gentleman reimburse all the domestic wholesale grocers who had sugar when the price went down?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. I will say to the gentleman that that line of talk is all demagoguery. That broad kind of talk means nothing. I am here as one Member of Congress—

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Answer the question and we will see if it is demagoguery.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. I do not yield further. I am here as one Member of Congress to take up any claim that comes here, and am ready to consider each one on its merits. This talk about reimbursing everybody who sustained losses, without bringing in any definite claim, means nothing at all. I sympathize with all who lost money as a result of the war, but we can only consider each case as it arises.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for just one brief question, because I really have an open mind on this case up to date. I want to do what is right. If this man has a good moral claim, I want to pay him his money.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. As I understand it, his claim is based from the moral standpoint on his letter to the Department of Justice, dated June 10, 1920, in which he sets out the conditions under which he is willing to enter into this transaction.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. If the gentleman has the complete hearing of the House and Senate held last year, the gentleman will see there are many other letters confirming the department's agreement with Watson.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In reply to that the Department of Justice, through its representatives, answered:

You will be permitted to import the sugar mentioned upon the terms set forth in your said letter.

That is the basis, as I understand it, of the claim.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. That is part of it. Yes; and there are other reasons.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is all I can find as a written agreement.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. I want to say that if you will look at the hearings before the House and the Senate that have been held on this case when Mr. Watson's claim was before the Senate, the Department of Justice sent a letter to the chairman of the Senate committee, and also to the chairman of the House committee, to the effect that the department believed that these claims were meritorious, on a par, and should be paid. I will say to the House that three different Attorneys General—Palmer, Daugherty, and the present Attorney General, either personally or by their representative—have all indicated that these claims were just and that these men should be reimbursed, and if that is not instruction to this House I do not know what is.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] says the department's agents did not have the authority to enter into these contracts. Whether they did or did not makes no difference. They did enter into these contracts, and how can an ordinary citizen of the Government know if the department comes to him whether the department is acting legally or not? If the department is at fault we ought not to place the blame and responsibility on the private citizen who carried out the contracts of the department.

Mr. GILBERT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. GILBERT. Conceding that, will the gentleman point out where the Government guaranteed him the price?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. The department did not guarantee him any price, but when sugar was selling in this country at 27 cents a pound the department made him agree that if he brought the sugar in he would not make more than 1¼ cents a pound, and the United Cannery Association, a quasi Government corporation of the Department of Justice, was to get 1 cent a pound. He could not make any more than that, and, further, he was bound by an ironclad agreement not to let his sugar go through any channel except that which the Department of Justice should designate.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Did not Mr. Watson have ample opportunity to sell sugar at a profit before the market broke?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. He could have sold his sugar after he bought it in the Argentine at 7 cents a pound profit, and the only reason he did not do it was that he considered he was duty bound to the Department of Justice to carry out his agreement.

Now, gentlemen, I am going to make this concluding statement: When I came down here seven years ago I took a solemn obligation to support the Constitution of the United States, and I say to you that when an agency of the Government by any pretense whatever leads a humble citizen of this Commonwealth into a program that results in his complete ruin and destruction financially, it is no more nor less than confiscation of that man's property. If we stand by any agency of our Government that actually confiscates a citizen's property, then we are getting pretty close to Russia. I could not stand idly by and watch anything of that kind go on without my protest, and I hope that when this question comes to a vote that we in fairness to ourselves and Mr. Watson, on the basis of the golden rule, "That we should do to others as we would be done by," that we will put ourselves in Mr. Watson's place and realize that if the Government had caused us to lose our homes and our life savings, we would ask and deserve reimbursement. Yes, gentlemen, if we were in the same place as this man, we would be here day and night trying to get the Government to settle a just obligation, and the Sugar Equalization Board should by all means pay this obligation. The board has already recovered in the Treasury over thirty millions of profits resulting from the board's operations.

The board has yet in its possession over twelve millions for the purpose of settling these losses, and they should, in the name of right and justice, make such settlement. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and eight Members present, a quorum.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, how does the time stand?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky has 18 minutes and the gentleman from Nebraska 11 minutes remaining.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SUMMERS].

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, there seems to be some controversy as to the merits of the bill now under consideration. I shall not address my remarks to that bill, but I shall bring to your attention an amendment, which I propose to offer, concerning the merits of which there should be no division in the House.

At the end of this bill I shall propose this amendment:

Provided, That the President is authorized to require the United States Grain Corporation to equitably distribute to the wheat growers of the United States $75,000,000 profits accumulated by the United States Grain Corporation in handling wheat grown in the United States during the World War.

The situation, as I understand it, is this. A board was appointed to fix the price of wheat during the World War. They met and after much controversy finally compromised on a price of about $1 a bushel below the price the farmers were receiving at that time. It was understood that the price agreed upon was to be the price at the primary market and was meant to be a minimum price. Instead of that it was construed by those who administered the act as being the price at the terminal markets and as a maximum price. As a result of this, according to those familiar with the situation, the American wheat growers suffered a loss of from one to two billion dollars.

So far as I can learn, there was an accumulated profit of $75,000,000, and some say more than $100,000,000, and some say $56,000,000. A while ago I called up the United States Grain Corporation and undertook to ascertain the exact figures. I was informed that the corporation is in the course of liquidation, and that all books and figures are in New York. Then I recalled that I tried to ascertain some information in regard to this same subject three or four years ago, and the representative of the United States Grain Corporation in this city was absolutely unable to give me any information, except that everything is in the city of New York. I submit this for your consideration when the time comes to offer the amendment.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. HASTINGS. Would the gentleman be willing to accept an amendment to his amendment appropriating $50,000,000 to be distributed to pay back to the southern people for their cotton taken during the Civil War?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. The gentleman will have to make a statement of his case; and if he presents the facts clearly, I then will be willing to consider it.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have been a member of the Committee on Agriculture ever since these sugar claims have been pending before that committee. I think I have been present and have heard all the hearings on these bills. I have no unkind word to say against Mr. Watson. There is no doubt from this record that he is broke, and I am sure he is a good man. I want to lay before you in the little time that I have just the mental attitude of these gentlemen who went into this sugar business, and what action the Government took in order to get them in. There is no doubt that there was a shortage of sugar at that time, and that the price of sugar soared, and that the Government undertook to break that market. They did call several of these sugar men into conference here, and some of them in New York, for the purpose of getting them to import some sugar, but there is a difference between this claim and some of the others. Mr. Watson was not conscripted to go into the sugar business by the Government. He was not asked to go into the sugar business by the Government. On the other hand, he heard of it, and he went in of his own volition. He came from New York to Washington to get in touch with the representatives of the Department of Justice here for the sole purpose of getting the contract for the profit that he could make out of it, which was a perfectly legitimate ambition on his part. They said to him that they had placed the matter altogether in the hands of their representative in New York, Mr. Riley, and that he would have to go and see him. Mr. Watson got on the train and went back to New York and looked up Mr. Riley. Do not think that Mr. Watson was conscripted or persuaded to go into this business. He wanted to get into it. He then said that he did not want the Lever Act to apply against him and they said "all right, write out your agreement." He asked the Government to waive that, which it did, but the Government said it wanted to find the channels of distribution for the sugar when it got here, and Mr. Watson said:

I agree to permit your officer to designate the channels through which this sugar shall be distributed, provided that the ultimate purchasers satisfy me as to their financial standing and as to the terms of settlement.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Why was that necessary?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Because the Government wanted to protect the public from being gouged by sugar speculators which might buy it and raise the price. He agreed to that. What else? He went down and bought the sugar and before the sugar ever arrived here the price had gone to pieces. When the sugar got into the port of New York the price was broken. In his examination at that time, I asked him whether he claimed the Government was delinquent. He said that had no agreement been made, he would not have had to accept the distribution by the Government of his sugar. But, Mr. Chairman, when his sugar got here the price was broken. There was no channel through the Government for his sugar to go for the price was broken.

I want to talk to you a minute about Mr. Riley. He was a member of the department and their representative. When Mr. Riley was on the witness stand I said to him:

And if I understand you, your department never asked Mr. Watson to buy any sugar at all, but, on the other hand, he came to you? Mr. RILEY. Yes, sir; that is so.

He then went on to elaborate that and said that Mr. Watson came to him and said he wanted to make those contracts to buy this sugar.

These gentlemen made the defense that if he had been permitted to sell the sugar in the Argentine he could have sold it at a profit. The truth is that the Argentine Government would not permit him to sell a pound of sugar in the Argentine. So far as the American Trading Co. is concerned they got the State Department to intercede in their behalf to let them import the sugar out of the Argentine without putting up the 30 per cent pelee sugar, and after they got here and the bottom had dropped out of the price of sugar they wanted to sell it in the Argentine.

The State Department said that they would not ask the Argentine Government to permit them to have any special privilege in the way of shipping it out, without depositing the 30 per cent pelee sugar, and then turn around and flood the Argentine market with it. If there was such a profit on sugar in the Argentine, why would the Argentine Government permit the American buyers to come there and buy sugar and export it to the United States for consumption? If there was a shortage there and a great demand for sugar in the Argentine, they would not do such a thing.

As I say, this is an unfortunate matter. This man is broke, and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] says that this is a single individual. That is true. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] said in answer to a question from the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] about the retailers of sugar and the wholesalers of sugar throughout this country losing, that that statement is absolute demagoguery. The truth about the matter is that there were thousands of retailers of sugar and thousands of wholesalers of sugar in the country who had their sugar on hand when this crisis came who suffered the same loss that Mr. Watson did, just the same as the farmers of this country did, as the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SUMMERS] has just said.

The United States Sugar Equalization Board made a profit, but simply because this Sugar Equalization Board has some surplus on hand, claims such as this are brought in. That money belongs to the Government, and there is no difference in principle between taking money from the Sugar Equalization Board, that expects to turn it into the Treasury, and taking it out of the Treasury of the United States direct to reimburse these people.

I am familiar with this proceeding, and I have never seen a more insidious lobby in the time that I have served here. I never have seen a more insidious lobby infesting this Capitol than the lobby that pushed the other sugar claims. I am not saying that about Mr. Watson's claim. But as to the other claims, there never was a greater outrage. There is no moral or legal obligation here. If there is a legal obligation, they would have been before the Court of Claims months and years ago to assert their rights.

These men were not inexperienced, guileless business men. I asked Mr. Watson several times, "Did the Government ever say to you directly, or even by innuendo, that it would stand any loss that might accrue to you in case you did not make a profit out of this?" He always said it did not.

Gentlemen, war is a conglomeration of inequalities. Not only these people in the sugar business went broke, but thousands of farmers throughout this country after the war went broke through deflation. The farmers of the Northwest particularly have been knocking at the doors of the Committee on Agriculture for several weeks for hearings, telling of the precarious condition in which agriculture is situated with respect to all the various commodities raised on the farms of the United States. It is true they have asked us to provide a revolving fund out of the Treasury of the United States in order to save them and in order to uplift farming into a profitable industry. Over 700,000 farmers in this country have gone into bankruptcy in the last four years. That means a population of more than four and a half million people who have been driven from the farms of this country into the congested cities through no fault of their own, not through lack of industry; and yet you are going to say to-day that you will take one individual and pay him $735,000 out of the Treasury of the United States and let all others who suffered losses go unreimbursed. That is what it means.

This bill means to reimburse a man who went into this business at arms' length. He was not a novice in the importing business when he went in. He went in, of course, with the legitimate purpose of making money, but when the price broke it made him a pauper. But that is only one of a million cases in the United States of men engaged in all lines of endeavor that have gone broke since 1920 in this country.

Yet, in effect, by the passage of this bill you would be telling me that I must go back to my farmers, who went broke during the war, as were many retail sugar dealers and many wholesalers—you say I must go back to my people and face them after this House has acted favorably on this claim in behalf of one man who claims to have suffered loss. I do not believe in that kind of equality. I believe that this is all an afterthought. These people knew they could not stand 10 minutes in the Court of Claims, but they thought if they could come to Congress they could put this through and it would save them. In the two bills that passed this House the President referred only one to the Equalization Board. Any of these claims is a better claim than passed this Congress which was paid. It is a question at last for you to decide as to whether or not you are going to take over $735,000 of the taxpayers' money and reimburse one man. That is what it is in the last analysis.

This man, a broad, seasoned business man, looked up the department's representatives and said, "I want to get into this business," and he went into it on the same footing that the rest of them did. There are other claims that have never been reported. The Lamborn claim and the De Ronde claim are just as just as this is. Other men have gone broke under circumstances over which they had no control; they have gone broke in legitimate, honest business and in an honest endeavor to receive emoluments for themselves. If we undertook to pay them all, it would bankrupt the Treasury of the United States; it would bankrupt the United States Government to reimburse them for their losses.

What is the difference in principle between taking money and reimbursing these fellows who went into the sugar game and taking money out of the Grain Corporation treasury and reimbursing the farmers who went broke in the war? [Applause.] I would like to ask some one for this bill to rise in his place now and tell me the difference in principle.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. I will say to the gentleman that I would have voted for that, but it was not advocated.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Of course, it was not advocated. Because the farmer is not able to come here and lobby and provide big dinners at the Willard Hotel. He is not able to come here and stand here in the Capitol day in and day out and year in and year out, as a lot of these gentlemen did. I do not mean that to apply to Mr. Watson.

Mr. LEHLBACH. You do not mean Mr. Watson?

Mr. KINCHELOE. No; I do not. But I will ask the gentleman from New Jersey this question: If you reimburse Mr. Watson, why not reimburse De Ronde?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I say, "Reimburse him!"

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Yes.

Mr. LOZIER. Did not Congress ask the farmers of the country to produce more wheat and pork?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Yes; and when they went broke we did not undertake to reimburse them. I am going to stand consistent with the taxpayers as a whole in these matters. [Applause.]

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McSWEENEY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. McSWEENEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am trying to interpret my obligation as a Representative, which I think to a certain extent is that of being a mediator between the people at home and that invisible thing called the Government.

One thing is that I can not see where Mr. Watson had a right, when he got this sugar to America, to sell it; and if he was deprived of that right, it seems to me an obligation devolves on us as a government to take care of him. I am not questioning his right to sell it back in the Argentine, but I do question his right to sell it here in America, and I can find no place where the Department of Justice gave him the right to sell it to private purchasers.

There is another question that arises in my mind. I can not find anywhere that Mr. De Ronde has the right to carry his case into court; but if by the action of the Congress he is given that right, certainly we should give that right to Mr. Watson. We should do as the gentleman from New York [Mr. LA GUARDIA] suggested, permit him to carry his case into court. I feel we should open that channel to him. As I say, I do not understand the difference here. Mr. Watson, under the present circumstances, can not go into court, while Mr. De Ronde can. If our action will give Mr. Watson that right, I say we should take that action and let him have civil procedure to get some adjustment of what, it seems to me, is a deprivation of his rights on the part of our Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I yield nine minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. FORT].

Mr. FORT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in order that we may clear the situation a little in the minds of those who have heard only a part of the debate, I want to picture again for a moment the condition that existed in this country in 1920. As to that condition I have some direct personal knowledge, because at that time, having just retired from the Food Administration, I was asked by the Attorney General through his assistants to assist in a campaign to break the price of sugar through public agitation. At that time the price of sugar in this country was approaching the 30-cent level. The Attorney General, without strict legal authority, assumed under the provisions of the Lever Act—which had been a war-time law—a measure of control over sugar in this country which, I think, he did not legally possess, but in accordance with that assumption of power, in the interests of the whole people as he believed, I honestly think, Attorney General Palmer sought to induce the importation into the United States of sugar from whatever market it could be procured. He solicited the assistance of the importers of the United States in that effort. This solicitation was both public and private. In response to that solicitation Mr. Watson, an importer and exporter of long standing and familiar with the channels of trade, found that he could buy sugar in the Argentine. He went to the Attorney General and he said:

I have a chance to get 10,000 tons of sugar in the Argentine. Can I bring it in and can I charge enough profit to cover the financing and other costs necessary to bring 10,000 tons of sugar from the Argentine?

The Attorney General said:

Yes; provided, first, you will limit your profit to 1½ cents per pound; and, second, provided you will let me tell you to whom you can sell it when you get it.

Mr. Watson agreed.

Now, the big controversy in the debate to-day seems to have turned on the price factor, but that is not the important thing. The important thing is that Mr. Watson agreed with the Attorney General of the United States that when that sugar got here he would only deliver it to people that the Attorney General approved. Throughout the entire time, from the day he made his agreement with the Attorney General to the day the sugar arrived in New York, Mr. Watson solicited the Attorney General to give him instructions for distribution. The Attorney General said: "I want to keep this sugar to relieve the places that are in the greatest distress when the cargo arrives in America." Therefore, in two months, out of 10,000 tons of sugar, he gave him distribution directions for only 120 tons of sugar. Under those conditions Watson could not protect himself. Watson could not make a contract to sell the sugar when it should get here, as the ordinary importer could have done. He was estopped, and yet, honorable man that he was, Robert A. Watson refused to sell it in the market of the Argentine at a 7-cent profit because he had given his word to the Attorney General of the United States that he would bring that sugar in here and take a profit of a cent and a quarter. Then these gentlemen say he was working for a profit. I say to you, gentlemen of this House, that Mr. Watson did a patriotic act and that it was the acts of such men as Watson that broke the price of sugar in America and saved the people of America $1,000,000,000 in one year.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORT. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Suppose this transaction had been between private parties? Does the gentleman think Mr. Watson would have a cause of action?

Mr. FORT. Absolutely; as I understand the facts.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Then I understand there would be no objection to amending the bill so as to say to this board that they are to decide it upon that basis.

Mr. FORT. That is exactly the basis that the Sugar Equalization Board has taken on the other claims. I know nothing about the legal effect of that, but my own feeling is, as Mr. Watson has said to me—his home is about 100 feet out of my district, and although I never met him until this thing came up, I know that he ranks in our community as one of our leading and most honorable citizens—"The issue in this matter as I see it, Mr. Fort, is whether the United States Government and myself are both honest." And as I see the issue, gentlemen, that is the issue for this House to settle.

I have studied the record from one end to the other, and I can not find where Robert A. Watson did a dishonest thing or a dishonorable thing, but everywhere from start to finish of that record he did what you or I, if we stood in his place to-day, would be proud we had done, even though it did bankrupt us. [Applause.]

Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORT. Yes.

Mr. KETCHAM. Did he not do more than that in his offer to take a cent less?

Mr. FORT. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KETCHAM] reminds me that when the Argentine Government removed the export tax on sugar of 1 cent a pound, our Government had no official advice, but Mr. Watson wrote the Attorney General of the United States:

The Argentine Government has taken off its export tax of 1 cent. My price to you is reduced 1 cent.

One other thing is true also. He was directed by the Attorney General, and it was the only direction he ever had, that he must distribute his sugar through a certain channel of distribution, namely, the Cannery Supplies Co., an agency set up by the Attorney General, which the record shows expected to make, merely for giving Watson orders, a profit of 1 cent a pound, when all Watson was allowed to make was 1½ cents a pound for finding it, bringing it up from the Argentine, and financing it, and now that gentleman is assuming all the loss resulting, where he would have had to share the profit. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired. All time has expired, and the Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is authorized to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to adjust with Robert A. Watson, of South Orange, N. J., a certain transaction entered into and carried on by said Watson under the direction of the Department of Justice, which transaction involved the purchase in the Argentine Republic between the 11th day of June, 1920, and the 30th day of June, 1920, of 3,500 tons of Argentine refined sugar, the importation thereof into the United States, and the distribution of the same within the United States, and to require the said United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to liquidate and adjust the entire transaction in such manner as may be deemed by said board to be equitable and proper in the premises, paying to the said Watson such sums as may be found by said board to represent the actual loss sustained by him in said transaction, and for this purpose the President is authorized to vote or use the stock of the corporation held by him, or otherwise exercise or use his control over the said United States Sugar Equalization Board and its directors, and to continue the said corporation for such time as may be necessary to carry out the intention of this act.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all after the enacting clause.

Mr. Chairman and gentleman of the committee, a short time ago I asked a gentleman on the floor here who seemed from the heat and enthusiasm with which he discussed it to know a great deal about this bill for some pertinent information, and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. McLAUGHLIN], in a rather imperious and haughty tone, said that my question was demagogic.

I find the gentleman from Nebraska was not always of the same opinion that he now is with reference to this kind of claims. I find in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 25, 1922, when the American Trading Co. bill, I believe it was called, another sugar case on exactly all fours, so gentlemen say, with this claim—I find the gentleman from Nebraska making this kind of a statement. He was then as now very much aroused about the injustice being done to a citizen. He said:

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I was one of the members of the Committee on Agriculture who was at first naturally prejudiced against this claim. I voted several times to defer the claim and postpone final action on it from time to time and even signed the minority report in the Sixty-sixth Congress—not that the evidence at that time convinced me that the claim was not just, but certain members of the committee had said to me that they had something to disclose. They said, "You act with us and hold this matter back, because we have some testimony that can be brought in after a while to show that there is something underhanded, something crooked in this transaction." I waited until the final hearing was held before the committee, at which time a gentleman came before the committee and gave testimony on hearsay, which he afterwards withdrew.

And so forth and so on.

The purport of the gentleman's speech was that at first, like the rest of us uninformed Members, he was naturally prejudiced against the claim; and though he sat on the committee and it came up time after time, he voted to postpone it and voted to postpone it because they had told him there was something wrong about it, and then finally, after investigating and postponing, the gentleman signed the minority report against the bill; and then, forsooth, because some gentleman who is not informed asks him a civil question as to whether or not he would favor reimbursing domestic purchasers of sugar who lost in the same way as this claimant, he denounces the question as being demagogic.

The gentleman reminds me very much of an old gentleman from South Carolina who was in this House some years ago. One of his colleagues began to inquire of him about some rather questionable practices and asked him, "Now, would you, or not, under those circumstances do a certain thing?" He said, "Now, look here, old boy, you stop right where you are. You are fixing to ask me a lie." [Laughter.]

The gentleman almost stamped a hole in the floor here about his concern under the Constitution of the United States and told how he held up his hand seven years ago and swore that he was going to uphold the Constitution—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The gentleman said he swore when he first came here seven years ago with his hand uplifted that he was going to uphold the Constitution of the United States, and that he did not propose in the case of any citizen who had a claim that the Constitution should be disregarded. [Laughter.]

It has taken the gentleman almost seven years under that burning oath of his to find out that this kind of claim ought to be allowed because way back in 1922 he had been in Congress then some years and had not found out then that under this oath of his he was bound to pay the American Trading Co. on a claim similar to the one now before the House.

This claim may be a just claim; I do not know. I was trying to ask the gentleman from Nebraska to get information about it, and although he stood out and brought in a minority report, he, like all new converts, has more zeal and enthusiasm than those fighting in the same ranks all the time possess. I wonder why the gentleman changed his views. I wonder what operated on his mind.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Does the gentleman want me to answer it?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I will let the gentleman from Nebraska answer.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. The gentleman asked me in reference to the American Trading Co. bill.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. No; I did not. I asked the gentleman if he would favor reimbursement of those domestic dealers in sugar who lost money by the breaking of the price?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. If the gentleman will read the rest of the statement, he will find that I supported the American Trading Co. bill.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The gentleman did not at first.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. For the reasons given, but they did not discover anything and I supported the bill.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The gentleman was on the committee. It was his business to investigate the merits of that claim and not listen to other gentlemen on the committee who intimated that there was something wrong. [Applause.] The gentleman from Nebraska somewhere along the line saw a great light and changed his mind, and because some of the rest of us want to know what the light was, in order that we may be advised about the bill, the gentleman undertakes in a pleasant, polite way to insult us. That is the difference between the gentleman from Nebraska and the gentleman from Texas in that regard.

Mr. HOWARD. Which gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I mean the gentleman from Nebraska, Mr. McLAUGHLIN. The gentleman in a speech said that he had access to hundreds of pages of letters and that he had read them—letters which seemingly the full committee did not see. I wonder what access the gentleman had, what particular facilities he had, for discovering the truth that other members of the committee did not possess.

Now, I am not denouncing this bill; I want information; but when a gentleman in favor of the bill is so very enthusiastic but so irritable, when other gentlemen want to know about it, that he becomes offensive, there is a chance that we may form a conclusion that the bill is not what it ought to be. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the enacting clause. I do not think I care to be heard on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, can not I be heard?

The CHAIRMAN. There may be five minutes' debate in favor and five minutes against it.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, this is a very perplexing situation for me. What am I to do? If I vote to strike out the enacting clause, I vote to kill the bill. If I vote to kill the bill, I am carrying discouragement to the hearts of the magnificent members of the Agricultural Committee.

Here they have labored all winter in an effort to bring out some matter of legislation granting relief to agriculture. Here is the first offering they have made to their fellow Members. [Laughter.]

Now suppose I vote ruthlessly to destroy this first child which they have presented to us. [Laughter.] If I were on the Agricultural Committee and my first offering to my fellow Members on the floor should be destroyed, then I know I should be discouraged, and so I greatly fear that our vote here, if it shall be in opposition to this bill in behalf of agriculture, will be discouraging to the committee. [Laughter.]

It is true, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, that the fellow in whose behalf this bill has been drawn is not actually a sure-enough farmer, but if we can induce ourselves to grant him this three-quarters of a million dollars for the loss he sustained in gambling in sugar, who knows but we may reimburse the loss of all the farmers who gambled in wheat in war times. [Laughter.]

It may be a good thing for those of us who want to see agriculture properly cared for—it may be, I say—for us to vote for this bill. It is a rather nasty looking bill to me, but if it will produce good results in some other direction, perhaps we might better vote for it. I am like the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY]. I have an open mind, but my mind is more or less against the bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Texas, but I meant the other one. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman believe that if the committee can get us to pay $750,000 to somebody who just happened to handle an agricultural product that that will be some encouragement to agriculture?

Mr. HOWARD. That is my only hope. If I shall vote for the bill, it will be with the thought in mind that it may so encourage the Agricultural Committee that perhaps before breakfast to-morrow they will bring out something better than this in behalf of agriculture. Who knows? I do not.

A MEMBER. Ask Colonel House.

Mr. HOWARD. Yes; Colonel House might know, but he has gone abroad on a mission now—and I am informed, by the way, that he has gone on a mission for the biggest man in the United States of America.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. HOWARD. That is all. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment to strike out the enacting clause. In common with all of the members of the committee I have been amused and edified by the inimitable speech made by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. Howard]. He mentioned—and others have mentioned—relief to the farmer, both present and past. Of course we all hope and expect to pass legislation at this session of Congress which will afford substantial relief to the farmer. The limitation of profits by fixing prices during the war has nothing in common with the situation calling for the existing bill, nor has the fact that wholesale and retail sugar dealers and grocers might have sustained a loss by the break in the price any analogy with the situation with which we are confronted in this bill. Those people acted in accordance with their own judgment, and they were not limited in their dealings with the public nor, in their judgment, by the Government in any way.

However, we ought again to fix our minds on this fact. Mr. Watson purchased the sugar in accordance with a nation-wide campaign soliciting the purchase and importation of such sugar. The price is immaterial, although he had agreed to sell it at a cent and a quarter profit and allow the Government as a joint transactor a cent of profit. The fact remains that from the time that Mr. Watson purchased this sugar until it actually landed in New York City, during the entire period, he could have sold it in the Argentine at six times the profit he was to get in New York, and while the sugar was in transit he could have sold it in the United States at the profit called for by his agreement, and the reason why he sustained the loss was not because there was a break in the price of sugar after he acquired it, but because between the time that the sugar was acquired in the Argentine and the time it landed in New York City he could have made contracts with buyers of sugar at 20 cents a pound at any time if his hands had not been tied by his agreement with the Government, which prevented him from entering into such contracts with purchasers.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Why does the gentleman say that? The American Trading Co. in the hearings showed that they tried to sell it in the Argentine and the Argentine Republic would not stand for it, and the State Department said no they would not stand for it after they had asked the Argentine Government to relieve the trading company of the 30 per cent pelee sugar.

Mr. LEHLBACH. But Mr. Watson was not relieved from the deposit of the 30 per cent.

Mr. KINCHELOE. That is right.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Therefore, he had a right to sell it back in the Argentine any time that he wanted to. The limitation on the American Trading Co. with respect to resale was predicated upon the representation of the State Department that this was Government sugar.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired. The question is on the motion to strike out the enacting clause.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. KINCHELOE) there were—ayes 108, noes 42.

So the motion to strike out the enacting clause was agreed to.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out. The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CHINDBLOM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 358, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question. The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on striking out the enacting clause.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LEHLBACH) there were—ayes 122, noes 44.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present, and object to the vote upon that ground.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and eighty-five Members are present—not a quorum. The question is on the motion to strike out the enacting clause. As many as are in favor of the motion will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 218, nays 76, not voting 137, as follows:

THE TARIFF—SOUND FUTURE PROSPERITY IMPERATIVELY REQUIRES IMMEDIATE TARIFF REDUCTION—OUR DOMESTIC AND INTERNATIONAL TRADE

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record on trade, commerce, and tariff subjects.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record on trade, commerce, and tariff subjects. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the most important domestic inquiry in the public mind is, What economic policies will afford the best basis for our industrial and business growth and sound, permanent prosperity in the future? This tremendously vital question must be asked and answered in the light of the present postwar financial, industrial, and commercial conditions rather than those existing 100 years ago, or 50 years ago, or 10 years ago, if a wise and correct conclusion is to be reached. The postwar period reveals the United States as not only the foremost producer of foodstuffs and raw materials but the foremost manufacturing Nation in the world. Shall the United States adopt the permanent policy of manufacturing and producing for itself, gauging production as nearly as possible to equal domestic consumption, and "dumping" any surpluses arising, or shall it, from the standpoint of its own enlightened self-interest, readjust industries and industrial policies for the purpose of meeting both the home market capacity and a healthy growing foreign trade? I profoundly believe that, whether willingly or not, destiny has brought us into the position of an essentially exporting and trading Nation.

The question of tariffs and their related economic policies infects itself here. Our foreign markets depend both on the efficiency of our production and the tariffs of countries in which we would sell. Our own tariffs are an important factor in each. They injure the former and invite the latter. Their inflationary effects on all prices in our home market and their extortion upon the people will be discussed later. These excesses and infamies are but too well known.

A brief glance at its history and development in this country will more strikingly reveal the heights and true nature of our present tariff structure. The tariff has been a subject of never-ending controversy because of the deep-seated belief that it is grossly unequal in its effects upon the people. During the first 20 years after the formation of our Government the tariff was so essentially a minor question and was so submerged by bigger problems that no distinct opinion for or against protective duties existed. The tariff rates were trivial as compared with those of the present day. The maximum rate in the act of 1789 was 12½ per cent. The views, or rather the impressions, of Madison and others shifted from time to time. The entirely casual expressions of statesmen about the unimportant subject of the tariff in that remote period and under wholly different conditions from those of to-day shed no light upon the question of what their settled views would now be were they alive. I therefore attach no importance to isolated quotations from them which we occasionally see brought out in support of existing tariffs. We can only obtain their true attitude by applying their political philosophy to our present tariff and general economic situation. There is nothing uncertain about what that philosophy was. Imagine, therefore, if you can, Jefferson, Madison, Jackson, and Polk under their well-known banner of "equal rights to all and special privilege to none," marching at the head of the army of professional tariff lobbyists that came to Washington in 1921 and proclaimed themselves in favor of the high, extortionate, and unconscionable rates which they proceeded to write into the Fordney tariff law—rates designed to enrich one small class at the expense of the balance of the people. Any attempt to make the political philosophy of these early statesmen and patriots square with any important portion of the Fordney law is an outrageous libel on those great doctrines of human equality for which they stood and fought throughout their lives.

After the war of 1812-1814 the average tariff was raised to 20 per cent to pay the war debt and its interest. The "tariff of abominations" of 1828, with 30 to 45 per cent on textiles, was passed by accident due to political jockeying. It was greatly moderated under the acts of 1832-33, so that by 1842 it was lower than in 1816. There was no well-defined party division on the tariff until 1831-32. During this period protection was sought on the representation that the infant industries would within a reasonable time be able to stand alone without artificial stimulants, and that such industries would ultimately supply products as cheaply as they could be procured elsewhere. During the two generations following 1842 protection of "infant industries" was abandoned as a tariff slogan and "labor" was substituted. The Walker tariff of 1846 imposed 30 per cent rates on most manufactures, with lower rates or none at all on other articles. The tariff act of 1857 cut these rates to a level of 24 per cent. This was a nonpolitical revision. The Civil War tariffs were piled high and yet higher, 47 per cent average, primarily to offset the large internal-revenue taxes imposed, and with the distinct announcement at the time that no protectionist even dreamed of making them permanent. They were to be reduced as other war taxes following the war. But to the amazement of the country the tariff beneficiaries, after the war, proceeded to form a close alliance with the Republican Party, then in power, and thereupon announced that these high war tariffs would not only be retained intact as a permanent peace system but that they would even be increased from time to time in the future. This is precisely what later occurred. They went to 50 per cent under the McKinley tariff and 52 per cent under the Dingley law. Trusts and monopolies sprang up everywhere from 1897 to 1913.

This, in brief, is the story of tariff protection for industries, many of which were infants more than a hundred years ago. The principal tariff beneficiaries have completely dominated the Republican Party since 1867, and through it have written their own tariff rates in successive measures, with two exceptions, down to the Fordney Act of 1922.

Tariff beneficiaries have exhausted their ingenuity during past years in an effort to bolster up their excessive rates. They have even lugged in the name of Abraham Lincoln as one who if alive would stand for their extravagant rates enacted since the Civil War. In the light of Lincoln's political philosophy, entirely derived from the teachings of Thomas Jefferson, this has been a prostitution and perversion of his true views. Lincoln said:

The principles of Jefferson are the definitions and axioms of free society.

He then referred to the contentions of the opposition and stated that their object and effect were—the supplanting of the principles of free government and restoring those of classification, caste, and legitimacy. They would delight a convocation of crowned heads plotting against the people. They are the vanguard—the miners and sappers of returning despotism. We must repulse them or they will subjugate us.

If Lincoln's philosophy against government by a class and legislation for a class means anything, it means that he would, if living, denounce the unholy combination between modern tariff beneficiaries and the Republican Party and brand the high customs rates as an economic outrage.

A singular fact is that the Republican Party never attempted to define tariff protection until driven to do so in 1904. That party for a generation was accustomed to take a steam shovel and pile tariffs on tariffs until the greed of the beneficiaries cried "enough." There was no time for rules of measurement nor desire for restraints. In 1904, under threatened political stress, the Republican platform suggested the difference in production costs at home and abroad as a tariff basis. In 1908, feeling more secure politically, this definition was supplemented by the words "plus a reasonable profit to the domestic manufacturer." Experience revealed that the manufacturer constructed this as unbridled license to extort from everybody through unlimited high tariffs, with the result that this last clause has been omitted from Republican platforms since 1912.

The champion of tariff protection is always ready to urge typical high tariffs as a sure guarantor of prosperity to all classes of persons and all sections of the country. He not only declines to consider any other economic policies, however sound, but strives to avoid the consideration of the true merits of tariffs. There are two popular delusions which have been carefully developed during the past 60 years by cooked-up and paid propaganda. One is that the chief tariff benefits are intended for labor and agriculture. The actual beneficiary, the manufacturer, modestly remains in the background, while his hired agents and lobbyists keep the country flooded with spurious and false propaganda to mislead labor and agriculture. This astonishing impression has been built up in the face of the known fact that not a single farmer raising the staple products, as distinguished from a few minor specialties, has become rich through tariff protection, nor a single laborer, even in manufacturing industries enjoying the highest protection. On the other hand, we have seen a regular annual crop of wealthy individual manufacturers turned out through tariff protection. The other popular delusion is that the American people as a whole thrive better under high tariffs than under moderate or competitive tariffs. The historic facts are that every important panic since the Civil War has occurred either under Republican high-tariff administrations or their high-tariff legislation. The panic of 1873, under the Morrill high tariff; the panic of 1890-1894, under the McKinley high tariff, which was not repealed until August, 1894; the panic of 1907-8, under the Dingley high tariff; and the agricultural panic of 1921-1924, under the Harding administration elected in November, 1920, and the high agricultural tariffs in May, 1921, supplemented by the Fordney general tariff of September, 1922.

High tariffs have thus demonstrated, if anything, that while they can not create prosperity, they can wreck prosperity. To pursue the bedrock facts, I call attention to an exhaustive study of business depressions by Leonard P. Ayres, vice president of the Cleveland Trust Co., and one of the ablest economic authorities of the opposite political faith, and his conclusion to the effect that during 60 years preceding 1922, 4 years in every 10 were years of serious depression. No economic authority has challenged this finding, which was widely published.

For all practical purposes there are but two classes of tariff thought in this country to-day. One class thinks of tariffs in terms of revenue for the Federal Treasury. The other thinks of tariffs in terms of protection for some favored industry in this country. A tariff under the Constitution is a tax levied on articles imported from abroad. Under the doctrine of ability to pay, tariff taxes are the most inequitable of all, because they compel the poor man with a large family to pay more than the rich man with a small family. Since the arrival of income taxation modern high tariffs are more than ever a gift or a subsidy to a small class at the expense of the general public. Their avowed purpose is to increase the prices of domestic articles by restricting or preventing competitive imports. For example, when the Fordney tariff raised the rate 3 cents a pound on aluminum the price to the American people was promptly raised 3 cents. Modern high tariffs operate as a simple transfer of the property of producers who are not beneficiaries to those manufacturers who are, by making the prices of the latter higher than those of the former. If the tariff does not raise the prices, in what other way can it benefit our manufacturers? No manufacturer would countenance any tariff for a moment that would not enable him to sell his products to the American people at a higher price than he otherwise would. It is amusingly ridiculous to hear tariff champions on this floor become vociferous in proclaiming that the farmer gets 100 per cent benefit from his tariffs in the way of price increases, while they are silent as Julius Caesar about the manufacturers' tariff price increases. They had promised the farmer tariff prosperity, which they knew he would not get, and it is now a question of make-believe. Another point the student of tariff taxation must not overlook is that the difference between Republican high tariff professions and practices is as wide as the poles. Their professions of tariff theories are as plausible as their practices are outrageous. If the American people could only witness the passage of one Republican high tariff bill through Congress and could see the greedy army of highly paid tariff lobbyists swarming through the Capitol, each knowing just what he wanted and assured in advance that he would get it, a new generation would have to come along before another typical Republican high tariff measure would see the light of day. It presents a continuous round of political and legislative debauches with graft aforethought.

The usual high-tariff system only contemplates a manufacturing output that will meet home consumption. It breaks down completely and becomes a serious impediment when a nation produces substantial surpluses of manufactures or products which must be sold elsewhere. This is true for the reason that high-tariff beneficiaries always welcome every person who joins in demanding any rates he may desire on his products. This policy insures wider support for the general scheme. The inevitable result is that not only raw materials, semimanufactures, and finished manufactures, but many materials we do not produce in sufficient quantities or at all, and others the production of which is not economically justifiable, are plastered all over with tariffs. This means increased prices, higher artificial costs of production of finished manufactures, and a corresponding disadvantage in competing in international markets. Our adversaries are not heard to condemn high costs of production or high living costs for the obvious reason that they would be obliged to repudiate the logical effects of high tariffs. We urgently need more economics and less selfishness and politics in dealing with tariffs.

Ultrahigh tariffs contemplate the prevention of any appreciable competition from abroad. Such tariff policy requires a network of provisions for discriminations, restrictions, reprisals, embargoes, boycotts, and retaliations. The Fordney tariff law bristles with all of these. They in turn invite, or rather challenge, any and every sort of reprisals or unfair trade treatment, such as our rubber and coffee price hold-ups. This shortsighted and suicidal policy is in striking contrast with the Democratic doctrine of moderate or competitive tariffs for revenue, accompanied by liberal, fair, and friendly trade policies and methods. This policy also leads to such absurd and destructive acts as those of the present administration in objecting to American loans to British rubber monopoly producers or to the German nitrate monopoly or the Brazilian coffee monopoly, with the result that they turned elsewhere for the money and then proceeded to hold up American citizens on prices.

The Democratic tariff and trade viewpoint would have favored these loans, since we must have their products, but with the condition precedent that they would guarantee to us fair trade treatment and fair prices in the future. This wonderful opportunity was recently thrown away by the administration and the people are now paying the penalty to the tune of hundreds of millions of dollars annually.

No highly protected country has been able to maintain a growing and successful merchant marine for the reason that it is only desired to sell and not buy, whereas vessels must be loaded in both directions in order to succeed. And in addition, the tariffs on virtually all the hundreds of materials entering into the construction of vessels greatly enhance their costs, thereby necessitating higher freight rates.

High-tariff countries which undertake to do a substantial exporting business are obliged both to sell on long credits and to grant subsidies, rebates, drawbacks, and other gratuities both on the transportation and sale of surpluses. This is an arbitrary, artificial arrangement which sooner or later works disaster to the domestic economic structure, as was illustrated by Germany's experience during the years prior to the war. A general collapse of her network of artificial industrial and trade conditions was imminent when the war broke out.

Our foreign trade is a tremendous factor in our domestic prosperity. Every country has an internal and external trade. Internal trade simply involves a distribution of products produced; external or foreign trade is a system of barter between nations. Each has something to sell and desires to purchase something. The sales may take the form of goods or services or both. By services is meant amounts realized from shipping, banking, insurance, tourist expenditures, and immigrant remittances. Capital loans, which means selling on a credit, are also a factor. Imagine the collapse in all industry if the United States could not export and sell her vast surpluses of cotton, tobacco, mineral oils, wheat, automobiles, lard, coal, copper, and an immense quantity of finished manufactures.

Foreign trade is really the mutually profitable exchange by nations of their surpluses. Europe, for example, must import foodstuffs and raw materials, while she desires to sell the more finished manufactures of many kinds. Her best customers are the more backward countries in finished manufactures, but which have surplus raw materials and other goods which Europe can profitably utilize. The United States is more nearly self-contained than any other nation. Its chief needs from abroad are such raw materials as rubber, silk, tin, sisal, potash, nitrates, flax, hemp, and jute, and such other commodities as coffee, tea, sugar, and tropical fruits. This country, on the other hand, desires to exchange large surpluses such as those already mentioned. With our surplus of materials and our superior manufacturing capacity, how can we stay out of a large world trade? How can our debts abroad be paid and our surpluses of agriculture, of textiles, of iron and steel products, of coal, of automobiles, of leather products, and numerous others be disposed of? The alternative policy is "dumping" and periodical slumps and stagnation at home, such as are probably ahead for this year. Prices advanced 15 per cent during the period near the Fordney enactment, and except for overproduction they would have continued, but, as in 1923 and 1924, we will have fluctuations upward and downward. After the war there should, but for the tariff, have been a gradual recession of prices, as in the auto trade, the prices of which are now lower than before the war.

International trade does not mean that one nation would seriously displace the products of another any more than the Ford car has been displaced by other cars of different quality and price. It means, as a rule, that a nation goes out into the world and locates and develops new markets for its surpluses. This progressive course increases business, increases foreign living standards, and increases the demand for our goods. The world to-day offers America a most inviting opportunity to extend her foreign markets and develop her foreign trade to the extent of our surpluses in every line. This view is evidenced by the fact that the actual volume of international commerce is still below the level of 1914, notwithstanding the great increase of population in the meantime. The United States, England, Germany, and France, with less than 300,000,000 people, are the workshop of the world, which contains 1,800,000,000 population. Resolute action on our part, however, is required if we would take our rightful place in the field of world commerce. This is where high tariffs offer a tremendous obstruction.

I am a friend of legitimate business of every kind, big and little, and would do anything feasible to advance its welfare. It is my strong conviction that our tariff-protected manufacturers are wholly wrong in their view that this country can best succeed behind high-tariff walls. This is simply a difference of opinion. It is my unqualified belief that as this country becomes economically independent it is vital that it should correspondingly throw off artificial restrictions and restraints on its production and trade, such as high tariffs. They breed inefficiency, waste, and absentee management, as well as high cost of production.

To our credit, however, be it said that despite burdensome tariffs on their materials and machinery, a few manufacturing industries have established a wonderful state of efficiency and hence fairly low production costs and are selling their goods in all world markets. The automobile, the machinery, the cotton-cloth, the boot-and-shoe, and other industries are shining illustrations. We must buy more, however, if we would sell in increasing quantities. We shall otherwise be obliged to increase our importations of gold, of which we have already drained the world, or reduce exports, or make foreign loans to cover the difference, and the latter can not be continued indefinitely. And besides, the more we loan the more must be paid back with interest by some means. High-tariff champions, realizing that increased exports necessarily mean increased imports, bitterly oppose loans abroad. Floor Leader Fordney proclaimed in the House of Representatives in 1921 that a "dollar loaned abroad was a dollar lost." America, of course, can never establish herself in growing world trade to the fullest extent unless some of her surplus is placed in foreign productive enterprise, thereby enabling others to produce and to secure the purchasing power necessary to buy from us.

This condition also calls attention to the outstanding fact that high tariff advocates since 1920 have deliberately planned to junk our foreign governmental debts. Tariffs not only breed selfishness but an unreasoning fear. Our debts as rapidly as possible must be canceled on account of the fear that their payment might force more liberal tariff and trade policies. Already we have scaled these debts many billions of dollars in principal and interest. Since our virtual cancellation of the Italian debt the English and others seem to have commenced their expected drive for further readjustment downward of their respective debts. We are in the act of canceling our debt against Germany, $255,000,000, for our Army occupation on the Rhine. Within two or three years I predict that the Dawes reparation plan will be greatly curtailed or emasculated. These incalculable losses are in considerable measure our penalty for high tariffs and economic isolation. This and the preceding administration at Washington will go down in history as the costliest administrations to the American taxpayers during peace time since the beginning of the Government.

I now desire to call attention to the complete transformation in our entire financial, industrial, commercial, and general economic affairs that occurred during the war period. Our national wealth jumped from $186,000,000,000 in 1912 to $320,000,000,000 in 1920. The factory value of manufactured products rose from $23,987,000,000 in 1914 to $43,653,000,000 in 1921. The capital of manufacturers leaped from $22,773,000,000 in 1914 to $44,325,000,000 in 1919. The value of farm products increased from $7,886,000,000 in 1913 to $14,634,000,000 in 1920. The value of farm property rose from $41,000,000,000 in 1910 to $78,000,000,000 in 1920. Our foreign commerce went from $3,900,000,000 in 1914 to $13,500,000,000 in 1920. Exports for 1920 alone aggregated $8,228,000,000. Nearly one-half the gold of the world gravitated to this country. The Nation possessed unlimited supplies of foodstuffs, most raw materials, and a huge manufacturing plant never before equaled in efficiency and output. Our national savings were $18,000,000,000.

The other half of the world in 1920, on the other hand, was denuded of foodstuffs, raw materials, and manufactures; overwhelmed with debt; cursed with collapsed exchanges, depreciated currencies, and unbalanced budgets. Their one great need was foodstuffs and raw materials. Then was the time for America, dominating the world as she was—financially, industrially, and commercially—to adjust herself to both domestic and international finance and commerce. She could easily obtain and preserve a commercial foothold on every continent and in every country if she only willed to do so. The world was at our feet. The United States had but to pursue a policy of moderate or competitive tariffs for revenue, liberal trade policies, and fair trade methods. Her productive capacity was far beyond the needs of domestic consumption. The opposite course was pursued, and why?

The group of high-tariff manufacturers in this country again asserted their autocratic control of the Republican national leadership and decreed that America should pursue economic policies of aloofness and isolation and seek to live unto herself alone. They demanded and directed the rapid construction of extreme high tariffs around this country bristling with a network of trade obstructions and restrictions. This Nation, with its great prestige, then assumed world leadership in propagating high-tariff systems everywhere. Fifty-one of the 70 other countries proceeded to follow our example, and so sought to restrict to the very minimum trade with each other. One result has been that the international trade of all countries—except the United States, Canada, and one or two others—is to-day far below the pre-war level. Bitter trade wars have raged, as in the case of Germany and Poland. Many countries—such as Canada, the Argentine, Czechoslovakia, and others—not advanced in manufacturing are attempting to develop this class of industry and correspondingly to diminish their purchases of finished products from the United States, England, Germany, and France. In the meantime, the United States, shrinking from her unexampled world trade opportunities, kept her mind almost solely on the problem of erecting tariff obstructions against imaginary competition from every country.

Upon the deliberately false representation that agriculture was suffering injury under moderate tariff rates the Republican Congress sought in the latter part of 1920 to substitute extreme high rates on all agricultural products, and succeeded in so doing in May, 1921. They pointed to certain temporary dribbles of increased competitive imports, but cunningly ignored the outstanding fact that during 1920 we exported in excess of imports $218,000,000 worth of manufactured and raw foodstuffs and food animals, contrasted with an actual excess of imports over exports in 1925. With the enactment of the agricultural high tariff of May, 1921, the farmer was assured that he was then on the primrose path to lasting prosperity. One of the leading political parties solemnly sponsored this colossal fraud on the American farmer. The same political party early in December, 1920, instituted tariff hearings preliminary to broad and sweeping high-tariff legislation at the earliest practicable date. The Fordney general tariff act of September, 1922, was the result. This enactment marked a complete departure from the Republican doctrine of tariffs measured by the difference in production costs here and elsewhere. It was utterly impossible during that period to ascertain costs of production abroad or, to any intelligible extent, at home. Costs were not the same in different sections of the United States and were different in the same industries. Relative costs, therefore, were a mere phantom as a tariff basis. Loud clamor, however, demanded radical rate increases, basis or no basis. The final outcome was that this general tariff law, strange and unprecedented as it was, was based on prices, although our domestic prices were never more violently fluctuating, while foreign exchanges were crashing. It was at this brief period of utter instability of production costs, prices, and foreign exchanges that the Republican administration enacted a general permanent tariff law. The pretext on which they predicated this hasty leap in the dark was the so-called flexible tariff provisions, which would enable the President to readjust rates as economic conditions became stabilized and practically remake the Fordney law so as to conform to peace conditions.

The American people overlooked the fact that the planets would be more liable to leave their respective orbits than a high-tariff administration would reduce a single tariff rate unless driven and kicked and clubbed into such righteous action. The truth is that the United States was experiencing an insignificant amount of sporadic items of imports of a purely temporary nature on account of collapsed exchange conditions in certain other countries, and a permanent tariff system was based on this fleeting condition. The rates were made as nearly prohibitive as possible against these temporary and abnormal prices of a limited number of commodities from abroad, while future industrial and trade developments were wholly ignored.

When the lobbyists and Republican politicians were clamoring for the speedy enactment of the Fordney high-tariff measure, an uninformed person would have been convinced that from 1919 our country had been undergoing a ruinous experience from foreign competition. He is surprised now to look back and see that during the four years from 1919 to 1922 our exports were $24,465,000,000 while our imports were $14,804,000,000; that is, we were selling $9,661,000,000 more than we were buying. This is the way America was "ruined" during that four-year period. Hired tariff lobbyists and their political supporters wildly pointed out that imports during 1922 were greatly exceeding those of 1921, and that home manufacturers were about to be overwhelmed. It is true that in dollars imports for 1922 exceeded those of the previous year by $603,000,000, but the big fact in this connection is that $514,000,000 of this amount comprised raw and other materials for finished manufacturing here, while the increase of imports of finished manufactures was the insignificant sum of $44,500,000, or less than the average annual increase before the war, when prices are equalized. Following the war, and especially the panic year of 1921, our domestic stocks of raw materials had become low, with the result that an increased amount of these products, almost solely those not produced in this country, were imported during 1922 and 1923.

The total imports of finished manufactures, dutiable and free, ready for consumption in 1921 were $619,000,000, or in quantity not above the pre-war volume. But our exports of finished manufactures for 1921 were $1,626,000,000, compared with the five-year pre-war average of $654,000,000. The imports of all foodstuffs for 1922, chiefly noncompetitive, exceeded those of 1921 only $45,000,000. These figures show how the farmers were being "flooded" by imports from abroad when the Fordney law was enacted to "protect" them from the "foreign avalanche."

This utterly sleeveless state of trade facts was grossly magnified to make it appear that American producers and manufacturers were being overwhelmed to the point of imminent destruction by oceans of foreign imports of foodstuffs and finished manufactures, and a huge economic scarecrow was thus constructed in order to frighten the people into acquiescing in the Fordney tariff outrage. During this very period the balance of the world was hungry and crying for our foodstuffs, raw materials, and finished manufactures. No home market was ever so impregnable and secure as ours.

The most amazing misunderstanding exists in regard to the application of the Fordney Act to existing industrial and trade conditions and also to its revenue yield, then and since, due to the fact that the tariff beneficiaries have constantly kept the country doped almost to death with false propaganda. The Fordney tariff law flew in the face of every sound economic policy and of every industrial and trade condition in this country. Its proponents at the time diverted attention from the main facts revealing our high state of industrial and trade development and pointed alone to certain scattering import increases.

Before entering upon a detailed analysis of the Fordney law and its misfit applications to our new postwar economic conditions I desire to comment briefly upon the two points which its sponsors now suggest in justification of the law. One is that it yields a Treasury revenue of nearly $550,000,000, and the other that the nominal trade figures show an increase of imports and exports. The amount of revenue derived does not necessarily afford the remotest index to the kind and character of the rates and the tariff level. A tariff law might raise all its revenue from imports we do not produce or from raw material rather than from competitive manufactures. A general tariff law, again, might raise all its revenue from sugar, raw wool, tea, and coffee, while prohibitive as to all finished manufactures. The recent English rates on sugar alone would yield nearly $500,000,000 revenue to our Treasury without a dollar from any other tariff item. Since the coming of the income tax the true test of the scope and nature of tariffs in the most vital respect is not the revenue yield but their effects on imports of finished manufactures ready for consumption. These relate to the tens of billions dollars' worth of articles of a million different kinds and qualities which our 115,000,000 people purchase to wear and to use.

The average tariff rate, for example, on finished woolen manufactures is 61½ per cent; cotton, 47 per cent; silk, 60 per cent; metals, 49 per cent; sugar, 40 per cent; sundries, 40 per cent; pottery and earthenware, 60 per cent. This shows an average tariff rate for these seven groups comprising in the main finished manufactures ready for consumption of 49.7 per cent.

The average citizen has been falsely taught by propaganda that the increase of customs revenues from $305,000,000 in 1921 to nearly $550,000,000 in 1925, which is only $350,000,000 in 1913 tax dollars, was due in important measure to increased imports of these finished manufactures as distinguished from raw materials and other crude commodities. Nothing is further from the truth.

The yield from sugar and raw wool alone approaches one-third of our total tariff revenue. We could easily raise a billion dollars from these and a few other crude-material sources, but, like the present yield from the Fordney law, it would be the costliest revenue to the taxpayers and to industry that ever went into a government treasury. A well-balanced, moderate, or competitive tariff system for revenue would remove the tariffs from most imported products we do not produce, excepting some purely luxuries, and afford competitive imports an opportunity in our markets to the extent of 5 to 10 per cent of our domestic production. This also would prevent monopoly of domestic prices and would insure a reasonable revenue yield from each scale of rates.

It is clear that the present tariff revenue yield is derived from raw materials and other crude stuffs rather than competitive finished manufactures. This fact is illustrated by the increase of customs revenues of $153,000,000 for 1922 over 1921, whereas the imports of finished manufactures ready for consumption only increased in value—not in customs receipts—$44,500,000. If we equalize pre-war with postwar values, the imports of dutiable finished manufactures even to-day are less than like imports prior to the war, notwithstanding our individual consumption has doubled during past years and the factory value of our manufactured products went from $43,000,000,000 in 1921 to $63,000,000,000 in 1925. This is an astonishing condition, which shows the absurdity of making the revenue receipts a test of the true nature of a general tariff structure and its economic wisdom.

I desire now to direct attention to the wholly misleading character of the figures of imports and exports under the operation of the Fordney tariff. When the figures of imports for 1923, the first full year of the Fordney Act, showed an increase of $697,000,000, high-tariff beneficiaries professed astonishment and left the impression that a great volume of competitive imports were pouring in over the extreme high rates of this law.

Secretary Hoover's Yearbook of Commerce for 1923 utterly dispels this myth. The book says:

Higher prices account for almost all of the increase.

Figures are then cited showing a net price increase of $670,000,000, leaving an increase of quantity or volume of increased imports for 1923 of the puny amount of $23,700,000. Silk, sugar, coffee, rubber, wool, newsprint paper, burlaps, tin, and copper were chiefly responsible for this import situation. The increase of dutiable imports was due to the transfer of many articles from the free to the dutiable list by the Fordney law. Do not overlook this fact. The imports for 1924 were less than those of 1923 by $180,000,000, chiefly on account of the decline in silk, wool, hides, and lumber imports. In 1925 the imports exceeded those of 1924 by $618,000,000. But again to quote the official reports from Secretary Hoover's Department of Commerce:

Fully half of that increase has been owing to price advances.

I may also add that $584,000,000 of this apparent import increase comprised raw and other materials for finished manufactures, while the increase of imports of finished manufactures during 1925 was only $47,000,000, and the two chief items in this increase were art products on the free list, $15,000,000, and burlaps we do not produce, $25,000,000.

These plain citations tell an entirely different story from that fed out to the American public intimating great imaginary sluices of competitive imports under the Fordney law. When import values have been swollen several hundred million dollars by foreign monopoly holdups, such as rubber, coffee, tin, and potash, high-tariff champions have proclaimed them as a large increase of our foreign trade under the Fordney Act.

The true story of the so-called growth of our exports is found on page 464 of Secretary Hoover's Yearbook of Commerce of 1924, to the effect that—

Making due allowance for the influence of price changes, the trends of the statistics for a longer period of time, exports do not appear quite to have reached the level that would have been reached by this time had the average rate of increase for the 10 or 15 years prior to the war continued.

In other words, had there been no war and no great expansion of business, of prices, of consumption, and of surpluses in this country, our exports now would occupy as high or higher level than they actually do.

This great country to-day should, and easily could, without tariff obstructions, be exporting around $10,000,000,000 of surplus instead of less than $5,000,000,000. Apart from the exports of finished manufactures that were made possible during the past four years by our foreign loans and by gold imports, what this country has been doing, and virtually all it has been doing, was making an exchange of near the same amount of foodstuffs and raw materials for foreign foodstuffs and raw materials not produced, or if so, in insufficient quantities, and manufacturing increased amounts of finished goods chiefly to meet the increased American consumption demand, which has doubled since 1900. This country should instead be manufacturing into finished products larger quantities of its own raw materials and of imported materials and selling the finished surpluses throughout the world. This we are not doing and the Nation is not making sound progress by restricting its finished exports virtually to the amount of our loans made abroad with which to pay for same. Secretary Hoover was unfortunate in his recent high-tariff plea when he intimated that our position as a great creditor Nation was not materially affecting our import and export situation and that the tariff was not destroying the ability of other nations to buy from us. The answer is patent. Europe in the first place has paid next to nothing of the principal and interest of her debt; secondly, she has drained herself of her gold with which to make partial payment for our exports; thirdly, our high tariffs have measurably checked imports, with the inevitable result that our exports will continue far below their sound and proper level.

In 1923 the actual production of the United States manufacturing industries averaged 72.2 per cent of their maximum possible output; iron and steel, 64 to 85 per cent; rubber goods, 66 to 73 per cent; paints and varnishes, 70 per cent; cotton textiles, 57 to 83 per cent; silk manufactures, 73 per cent; furniture, 79 per cent, and so on. Herein is stored future American prosperity, to be brought about by a constantly expanding international trade. Between 1890 and 1924 our exports were near one-sixth of our total trade, and there is no greater factor in our future economic welfare at home.

In the light of the obvious and controlling facts and figures which I have recited, let me repeat, just what was the object of the Fordney high-tariff enactment? We have seen that such tariffs greatly restrict trade among nations; that a nation can only buy to the extent that it is able to sell to some other nation, and that production costs artificially enhanced by tariffs are a tremendous impediment to exports and to world commerce. American industry during the years 1916-1920 had cleared 16½ billion dollars. Exports, as shown, were far outstripping imports. The sponsors of the Fordney tariff law were loudest in the claim that its chief purpose was to create and maintain high wages and higher living standards for American labor. They ignored the fact that we already had high wages. The impression was deliberately created, too, that all American labor was thus included. This is an astounding misstatement of fact. The United States Census of Manufactures for 1923 gives the number of wage earners in manufacturing industries at 8,778,156, whereas under the Federal census there are more than 40,000,000 wage earners in the United States. What relation have the Fordney high tariffs to the 860,000 coal miners, except to inflict upon them higher prices for all they buy to wear or use? There is no tariff on coal. What relation have these tariffs to the 1,777,000 railway employees, except to penalize them with high prices for the things they purchase? What tariff benefits are received by the 270,000 employees of electric railways; the 139,000 employees in the petroleum and iron-ore industries; the 43,000 in the copper industry; the 9,000,000 farmers and farm laborers not connected with the minor agricultural specialties claiming tariff benefits; the 887,000 carpenters; the 117,000 laborers in the slaughtering and meat-packing industry; the 131,000 brick and stone masons; the 195,000 blacksmiths; the 212,000 electricians; the 206,000 plumbers; the 323,000 painters; the 281,000 other mechanics; the 1,117,000 salesmen and saleswomen; the 414,000 clerks in stores; and on through the huge list of around 34,000,000 American wage earners not remotely in contact with tariff benefits, but only with its burdensome prices? There are not over six to six and one-half million wage earners in the industries which actually secure tariff benefits.

Notwithstanding these plain official facts, the false cry of protection to American labor, implying all labor, has resounded through this country for two generations. And the fact may be here noted that in the highest protected industries, such as the textiles, there have been more strikes, lockouts, and wage reductions than in any other. If high tariffs are so potent in increasing wages and living standards, why have they not been thus affected in scores of other nations which have maintained tariff protection, and why are wages lower in the highest protected industries in this country than in those other industries securing no tariff benefits, such as the building trades, the shoe industry, the automobile industry, the railway industry, and a long list of others?

The truth is that power and machinery are the great factors in American production. From 1914 to 1923 our primary horsepower in industry increased from 22,401,000 to 33,904,000. From 1899 to 1923 the volume of production increased 185 per cent; the number of wage earners, 90 per cent; installed primary power, 236 per cent. Intelligence and skill of labor, efficiency, new machinery, improved management, elimination of waste, mass production, and increased horsepower tell the story of manufacturing success in a number of lines. In these circumstances the highest-paid labor is the cheapest labor. The output per man, and not the money wage, is the test. And furthermore, we are blest with most ample foodstuffs, while such competitors as England must import two-thirds of her foodstuffs and 80 per cent of her raw materials. It is under these methods and conditions that America increases her per capita productivity and hence maintains the highest wages, the highest living standards, and lowest production costs in a number of lines. One American laborer who a few years ago operated five looms now operates 36 automatic looms. New brick machinery in Chicago enables one person to turn out 40,000 bricks per hour, compared with 60,000 per day in Germany a few years ago.

One American laborer produces four times the amount of tin plate than one in England. In the cotton textiles the output per laborer in the United States is four times as great as in Japan. Japanese cotton mills require four times the number of employees for the same amount of machinery as an American mill. The result is that the money cost per yard of cloth is three-eighths of a cent in Japan and one-fourth of a cent in America with automatic looms. The production of pig iron per man in the United States has increased from 671 tons in 1909 to 1,179 tons in 1925. In 1916 it required one man 1 hour and 42 minutes to produce a pair of shoes, while to-day 54 minutes are required. The output of workers in the cotton mills has increased three and four fold. One woman, for example, operating 25 machines, makes 150 dozen pairs of socks daily.

The wage cost of total manufacturing production in 1923 was only $11,000,000,000 compared with products with a factory value of $60,555,000,000, or a value added by manufacture of $25,850,000,000. These interesting facts show that labor is receiving no more than its due and not as much in some industries. In 1925 we exported and sold countries abroad, including all those with so-called cheap pauper labor, $1,800,000,000 of finished manufactures. Nothing is more false or absurd than the citation of money wages abroad for the sake of American labor comparisons. There are a number of other factors entering into the wage situation, and besides the output per man is the test. And again, money wages in countries with depreciated currencies often have twice the purchasing power internally than externally when converted into dollars. Experience has taught that efficiency and consequent reduction of production costs contain the chief secret of high wages. If given an opportunity, American labor will continue to demonstrate the folly of high tariffs, and that to afford the fullest measure of employment at the highest wages, trade among nations should be extended instead of restricted by excessive tariffs.

Probably the silliest twaddle ever injected into a tariff argument is the statement, made in the worst of bad faith, that on account of our tariffs some 4,000,000 laborers were idle in the fall of 1920. Labor was receiving a wonderful high level of wages at this time, there were no hurtful imports, but on the contrary we exported $3,228,000,000 during 1920. Hence the ground is cut completely from under the usual tariff arguments about low wages and excessive imports and resulting unemployment. The fact was that the Republican Congress had deadlocked the Government for two years and opposed every effort at international economic cooperation designed to keep our foreign trade channels open for the disposal of surpluses, while at the same time the millions of American soldiers were gradually being fitted back into industry amidst all sorts of temporary confusion and delay. The truth of the whole matter is best told by Secretary Hoover's Year Book of Commerce for 1922, as follows:

The President's conference on unemployment was called at Washington in September, 1921, to consider relief for the four to five million workers who were unemployed as a result of the depression of 1921.

Note the words "depression of 1921." The report of the Secretary of Labor states that 5,735,000 were unemployed in 1921, and most of them until the spring or summer of 1922. Not tariffs, but new highway building, new railway improvements, the automobile boom, and the building boom to catch up after the war—all temporary except one—finally relieved the labor situation.

Revenue considerations were not even thought of when the Fordney law was framed and enacted. The internal tax reduction bill was pending part of the time. Republican leaders were shouting that internal taxes must be reduced in order to reduce the cost of living, and at the same time they were valiantly heaping on high tariff rates in order to increase the cost of living. It so happened that there were those who desired large duties on such articles as sugar, raw wool, burlaps, and a number of similar materials for finished manufactures, otherwise the revenue yield would have been less than normal.

For the year 1924, compared with 1921, there was an actual decrease of customs revenues from the silk schedule of $916,000, although the luxurious products of this industry retailed to the American people at $1,000,000,000 to $1,250,000,000, and raw silk consumption increased from 45,000,000 pounds to 63,000,000 pounds. The great cotton schedule only showed an increase of $1,568,000 for the same period. These illustrations are sufficient to negative the popular impression about the chief sources of tariff revenue increases.

The average ad valorem rates of the schedules in the Fordney law obtained by dividing the amount of duties collected by the values of dutiable imports is grossly misleading as an index to the true and full level of the various tariff rates. Too many of these rates are prohibitive and hence concealed to render this sort of calculation at all accurate. Even this test, however, shows an increase of the chemical rates from 21 per cent in 1921 to 31 per cent in 1924; an increase of earthenware schedule from 34 to 40 per cent; of metals from 21 to 49 per cent; of wood manufactures from 15 to 22 per cent; and of sugar from below 30 to 40 per cent. The average ad valorem rate on all dutiable imports, 1924, is thus revealed as 36.56 per cent. From the standpoint of protection our postwar railway freight rates have afforded to all inland sections of the country the advantages of a reasonable tariff system. The Fordney law was designed to afford double protection, including sufficient tariff to cover freight rates from coast to coast when necessary. Probably two-thirds of the rates or classifications or both are either prohibitive in their effects or entirely useless from the standpoint of revenue or appreciable competition. The unnecessary rates are intended to keep out local or sporadic imports and also to enable the domestic manufacturer without the risk of outside competition to raise prices abnormally in case of threatened scarcity, as was recently illustrated by the large increase in the prices of automobile tires, which carried a 10 per cent tariff.

At the very time the Nation was thus proceeding to fence itself in from "destructive" foreign competition, our imports of finished manufactures did not exceed 2½ per cent of the much more than $30,000,000,000 of merchandise retailed in this country to the American people. Most of this huge total, however, has since been sold at prices enhanced by the new tariff. In appraising or comparing imports, exports, and other trade figures it is important to bear in mind both price and quantity changes during recent years, because values depend on both.

Let us see what happened to the chemical schedule proper. Thirty-three new rates and classifications were added to the dutiable list. Virtually all other rates were greatly increased, some tenfold. The imports of chemicals proper for 1921 were $40,309,000, and for 1924, $42,700,000, with duties for the latter year of only $7,612,000. These general facts reveal the rates as highly excessive in the light of our largely increased consumption of chemicals. Most of the rates of acids are practically prohibitive, as is also true of indigo and other natural dyes. Potassium compounds, sodium compounds, flavoring extracts, lead compounds, calciums, and most other dutiable chemicals are so heavily tariff laden that only $21,160,000 subject to duties under the chemical schedule proper were imported in 1924, including many we produce in insufficient quantities or not at all. The factory value of chemicals in this country in 1923 was $630,000,000, wage cost 16 per cent, and dutiable imports slightly over 3 per cent. Chemicals are a serious cost factor in textiles, leather, steel, and most other important industries. Paints, colors, and pigments, for illustration, carry duties averaging 32 per cent, and the imports for 1924 were $2,840,000, compared with $2,362,000 in 1921, while the factory value of the domestic output for 1923 was $404,000,000 and wages 7½ per cent. The imports were about one-half of 1 per cent, while the exports for 1924 were $14,326,000. This one instance illustrates hundreds of cases existing throughout the Fordney tariff law. Soap is taxed from 24 to 30 per cent, with imports of $556,000 and exports of $7,400,000 for 1924, and more than that amount for 1925; value of production, $276,000,000; wages, 7¼ per cent.

Sulphate of ammonia, an important fertilizer ingredient, is given a tariff of 9.82 per cent, although exports greatly exceed imports. New duties on caseln, coal-tar products, dyeing extracts, quebracho, vegetable and other oils, and caustic potash, and acids, are chiefly responsible for increased revenues. It is little wonder that average wholesale prices of all commodities rose 15 per cent.

Authors of the Fordney Act surprised the country by the number of new and high rates which they prescribed for the iron and steel schedule. Iron and steel products are a major cost factor in virtually every industry in America. Coal and iron are the two great basic commodities which underlie all industry. Twenty-five years ago Carnegie and his men boasted that they could produce the cheapest steel in the world and would soon control the world's markets. Ours was the greatest and richest iron-ore reserves, the largest coal reserves, best skilled labor, and best business management. In the face of these facts and conditions, and of our 100-year-old tariffs on iron and steel, we now find new tariffs restored on pig iron, steel rails, and the ferro-alloys, abrasives, and most other raw materials except iron ore, and largely increased rates on all iron and steel products, commencing with crude iron and steel, although the United States produces 60 per cent of the world's pig iron and steel. The new tariff on pig iron, iron in slabs, blooms, loops, bars, wire rods, boiler and other plate, of iron or steel, range from 4.19 per cent on the former to 36 per cent on the latter. Steel ingots are given 20 to 26 per cent; structural iron and steel, 13 to 25 per cent; tubular products, 25 to 33 per cent; steel rails, 7.41 per cent; wire, 17 to 45 per cent; nails, 3½ to 24 per cent; bolts, nuts, and rivets, 5 to 18 per cent; cast-iron plates, wheels, axles, forgings, and so forth, 10 to 25 per cent; builders' hardware, 40 per cent, imports, $1,354; tinware, 40 per cent, imports, $18,185; bathtubs, 56 per cent, imports, $51,269; padlocks, 60 to 68 per cent, imports, $38,000; hinges, 40 per cent, imports, $126; horse and mule shoes, 4½ to 11 per cent, imports, $87,000; imitation and other jewelry, 80 per cent, imports, $1,566,000, while the value of domestic products is $174,000,000; tools, such as axes, saws, files, shovels, and others used by mechanics, 20 to 49 per cent, imports, $260,000.

The cutlery tariff provisions average 107 per cent. Table and kitchen cutlery 74 per cent, imports $40,715; pocketknives $1.25 to $3 per dozen, 146 per cent, imports $78,691; cheaper pocketknives 179 per cent; safety-razor blades 87 per cent, imports $1,473; exports over $4,000,000; pruning and sheep shears under $1.75 per dozen, 151 per cent, imports $2,883; other scissors and shears, 185 per cent, imports $38,108. These amazing rates cost the people near $50,000,000 annually.

Internal-combustion engines, 25 to 40 per cent, imports $50,000; electrical machinery and apparatus, 20 to 50 per cent, imports $2,748,000, exports $69,827,000, factory value of domestic products in 1923, $1,293,000,000, wages 24 per cent; other machinery, such as machine tools, textile machinery, printing presses, cash registers, lawn mowers, and most other, except agricultural, 30, 35, and 40 per cent; imports, including agricultural, $11,755,000, while the exports are $317,000,000. Why all these excessive tariff rates?

The iron and steel schedule proper shows imports of $28,578,000 and revenues of $7,834,000, or an average tariff rate of near 29 per cent. The total exports are $221,000,000, while the factory value of iron and steel products, not including machinery, in 1923 was $6,828,000,000; wages, 16½ per cent.

The imports are comparatively nominal. The cost of production in the iron and steel industry are measurably enhanced by high duties on ferro-alloys, chemicals, and other materials. The gradual decline of iron and steel exports since 1920 offers a striking illustration of the disastrous effects of extreme high tariffs on all raw materials, regardless of whether needed or whether the same are produced here in sufficient quantities, as it also makes plain the enhanced cost of production in all other industries.

The railroads consumed 22½ per cent of iron and steel products, or 5,986,000 tons, during 1925. On these and other products purchased for all purposes the railroads pay increased tariff prices of nearly $200,000,000 annually, which they pass on to shippers in the form of higher freight rates. The farmer not only pays his share of this but he also is a consumer of iron and steel products in the amount of nearly 20 per cent of the entire output, so that he falls heir to this additional tariff burden. The building and bridge trades consume nearly 18 per cent, thereby unduly enhancing the cost of all building.

In its treatment of the earthenware schedule the Fordney law heaped new duties on such crude materials as beauxite, 22 per cent; magnesite, 22 per cent; graphite, 10 to 49 per cent; crude talc, common blue clay, burrstone, 15 per cent, and in addition took from the free list and imposed a duty of 65 per cent on chemical, surgical, and similar articles and utensils, and a new duty of 45 per cent on optical glass for laboratory, hospital, and school purposes, while the Underwood rates on china and other vitrified wares, painted, enameled, and so forth, was increased from 55 to 70 per cent; from 25 to 40 per cent on decorated articles made of earthy or mineral substances; from 40 to 50 per cent on painted, decorated, and so forth, earthenware and crockery ware; from 50 to 60 per cent on plain china, porcelain, and other vitrified wares; from 30 and 45 per cent to a single rate of 50 per cent on table and kitchen articles and utensils of glass; from 50 to 100 per cent above the Underwood rates on glass; from 25 per cent ad valorem to 40 per cent on lenses; from 30 to 50 per cent on stained glass windows.

The imports under virtually every rate in the earthenware schedule are either nominal or of minor values with the following exceptions: China, porcelain, painted, enameled, gilded, 70 per cent; earthenware and crockery ware painted, enameled, gilded; and plate glass not exceeding 720 square inches. The special earthenware imports just described aggregate nearly $13,000,000 of the total of $16,700,000 of pottery and earthenware for 1924, while the plate glass imports mentioned were $9,950,000 of the total of $10,374,000 for plate glass.

This increase of glass imports under high tariffs was due to the great auto expansion. This industry consumes over 40 per cent of our plate-glass supply, and with the building boom added we were obliged to procure a substantial amount of plate glass from abroad in order to supplement our domestic supply, thereby meeting abnormal demands since 1922. Tariffs or no tariffs, we had to have it, even though enhanced tariff prices correspondingly increased production costs in both the auto and building industries.

Many Americans, especially the wealthy, insist on purchasing from abroad the more beautiful and artistic articles of tableware, such as china, porcelain, earthenware, and crockery ware, which are decorated, enameled, or gilded. They pay the price, regardless of tariffs, just as the general public would pay the increased price for coffee if it were subject to tariffs of 5 and 10 cents a pound. They want these things, and they are either not satisfactorily produced at home or they believe they are not. The factory value of domestic products of stone, clay, and glass products, 1923, was $1,538,000,000; wages, 28½ per cent. Total imports, 1924, $54,480,000, or a small fraction of 1 per cent. What the masses buy of earthenware does not come in over the tariff.

The Fordney tariffs in the flax, hemp, and jute schedule again illustrate the two important points already stated to the effect that unnecessary rates on raw products and raw materials, especially when we do not produce them, greatly increase costs to the consumer, and that the figures purporting to show increased dutiable imports under the Fordney law are very deceptive. For example, there were imported in 1921 $46,000,000 worth of jute bagging, cordage, unmanufactured flax, hemp, and burlaps of plain woven fabrics of single jute yarns not colored or dyed. These articles and their values were transferred from the free list to the dutiable list by the Fordney law, and quantities valued at $62,575,000 came in as dutiable in 1924. This shows only a transfer from the free to the dutiable list, rather than an increase of imports.

The United States must import all its jute, and to every practical extent its flax and hemp. It was monstrous economics to enlarge the dutiable list, as just pointed out, and it was equally unjustifiable to increase the tariff rates on other manufactures of flax, hemp, and jute. Why place a duty of 4 to 9 per cent on unmanufactured flax and hemp; 8.60 per cent on imports of burlap, aggregating $59,000,000; 20 to 27 per cent on jute bags; 10 per cent on jute bagging for cotton; and from 25 to 50 per cent on many jute fabrics? The first result we see of the new tariff on raw flax and hemp is an increase in the tariff on certain woven flax and hemp fabrics from 35 per cent, Underwood law, to 55 per cent, and an increase as to certain other woven fabrics from 30 to 55 per cent. The 35 per cent tariff on towels and napkins of flax, hemp, or ramie was increased to 55 per cent as to some and 40 per cent as to others. The tariff on linoleum was increased, although the imports for 1924 were $1,456,000, compared with factory domestic production of $52,527,000 in 1923, or less than 3 per cent imports. The American people feel obliged to import certain quantities of the flax, hemp, and jute industry just as they feel it necessary to import many other products we do not produce either at all or in sufficient quantities. The tariff load in such cases is as burdensome as it is unnecessary. It is this class of imports, and others we do not produce in sufficient quantities, or at all, that the people demand from abroad which accounts for most increased imports and increased revenues under the Fordney law.

The Fordney woolen tariffs are far higher than any others in the modern world. They impose 31 cents a pound on raw wool upon the pretended theory that the American woolgrower will have his prices correspondingly enhanced. The specific rate of 31 cents on wool, regardless of price, is a severe discrimination against the cheaper wools. The United States Department of Agriculture in February, 1926, stated the fundamental economic law underlying the wool situation as follows:

Wool prices in this country are governed very largely by world conditions, but any slackening in business conditions in this country may temporarily depress American wool prices below their usual relation to world prices.

For 50 years prior to the World War, under high tariffs on raw wool, the prices of comparable wools in the Boston and London or world market upon the average were not materially different. During February, March, and April, 1921, fine territory wool prices ranged from 87½ to 90 cents a pound, whereas after the high Fordney rates of May, 1921, the prices ranged from 82½ to 86½ cents the remainder of that year. During July, August, and September, 1924, the price of the same wool in Boston was lower than similar prices in London. For the year 1924 the average price of fine territory wools in Boston was only 6½ cents above the average world price, and if this should be attributed solely to the tariff, our woolgrowers only received $7,500,000 in tariff benefits, or about one-fifth of the tariff rates. If we allow 13½ cents as an average higher price per pound for our three best grades of wool above the London average price for 1924 and attribute this solely to the tariff, which is economically absurd, the woolgrowers' benefits are only $16,200,000 on a wool output of 200,000,000 pounds. The Farm Bureau Federation early in 1923 estimated that the raw wool tariff cost the American farmers alone $27,300,000. This is not the worst feature, because the woolen manufacturer increases his tariffs to correspond to a full-tariff benefit of 31 cents a pound to the woolgrower, with the result that the manufacturer procures the lion's share of tariff benefits. It is an economic axiom that the price of any commodity of worldwide production and consumption swings along near the world price level regardless of artificial tariff efforts to regulate and control it. Our woolen tariffs are sadly in need of the application of sound economics. There are 57,000,000 less sheep in the world than before the war.

The woolen schedule begins with 31 cents a pound on raw wool and proceeds with 63 per cent on wool yarns, with chief imports of $2,666,000. Cheaper yarns are shut out with 75 per cent. We have the usual imports of specialties under the woolen and worsted tariff provisions, aggregating $19,000,000 and carrying tariffs of 68 to 73 per cent. These are purchased by our wealthy class at near $2 per pound. Cheaper woolen and worsted cloths are virtually shut out by tariffs of 67 to 101 per cent, so that only $1,400,000 are imported. Total imports of woolen wearing apparel are $9,498,000 under tariffs of 57 to 86 per cent. This item comprises English overcoats and other special foreign designs which a small group of our wealthy citizens prefer, regardless of tariffs. The same class of citizens also purchased certain very costly oriental carpets at $7 per square yard, and 55 per cent tariff rate, in the aggregate amount of $12,067,000. We see that virtually nothing the average citizen or the masses use or wear comes in under the woolen tariff schedule. Most of his tariff rates, being prohibitive, are concealed from the import figures. The total imports of wool manufactures, such as I have described, are $52,153,000, whereas the factory value of domestic woolen products is over a billion dollars and they are retailed at 33 1/2 to 50 per cent higher. The wage cost is 23 per cent. The American people are undoubtedly penalized by the woolen tariff schedule to the extent of $250,000,000 to $300,000,000 annually. In this connection it is pertinent to call attention to the fact that many concerns engaged in textile manufacturing have built up an enormous capital out of profits through stock dividend operations and insist on tariffs high enough to permit 10 to 20 per cent profit on such swollen capital without the hazard of outside competition. This condition applies more or less to all the textile industries.

The cotton tariffs call for general readjustment downward. We again find that the rates are either grossly excessive or prohibitive as to virtually all cotton products except a small amount of fine yarns or fabrics which we either do not produce or produce in limited quantities, and specialties which wealthy Americans insist on purchasing from abroad. The factory value of domestic production in 1923 was $2,000,000,000; average labor cost, 21 per cent; average number of laborers, 495,000. The imports of cotton manufactures for 1925 were $79,273,000; exports, $148,238,000. A great outcry for new cotton tariffs was made in 1921 upon the ground that imports for 1920 were $137,583,000. The fact that during the same year exports were $402,000,000 was ignored. During the six years, 1920 to 1925, our exports of cotton manufactures exceeded imports over $500,000,000. In 1925, imports of cotton cloth, $26,424,000; exports, $85,000,000. The cotton-yarn tariff runs as high as 25 to 34 per cent, with imports of only $4,687,000. The tariffs on cotton cloth run from 11 1/2 to 45 per cent. We find such duties as the following on cotton wearing apparel: Fifty to 75 per cent on knit gloves, but $3,187,000 of the total imports of $4,379,000 are embroidered and imported by the well-to-do at 75 per cent tariff rate. The imports of hosiery are of the costly quality and $1,103,000 of the total imports of $1,239,000 pay a duty of 50 per cent. Exports of hosiery, 1924, were $9,095,000. Cotton shirts, 35 per cent tariff, with imports of $7,128; exports, $2,218,000. Knit underwear and other knit apparel, 45 per cent, with imports of $167,914. Handkerchiefs, 30 to 90 per cent, with no imports under the 30 per cent bracket, while $1,259,000 of the total imports of $2,284,000 come in under the 75 and 90 per cent rates through purchases of wealthy citizens. Cotton sheets and pillowcases, 25 per cent, with imports of $13,525.

These citations show the range and useless or prohibitive nature of the cotton tariff rates. In return for this high schedule the cotton manufacturer was obliged to acquiesce in exorbitant rates on his acids, dyestuffs, machinery, and most other materials entering into manufacturing costs. High-tariff protection thus inevitably means excesses and abuses. The English exports of cotton manufactures are 40 per cent below the pre-war level, while ours are higher than for any year since 1920. What could our cotton manufacturers not do if they were only relieved of many artificial increased-cost items resulting from existing tariffs? Unless the cotton manufacturer were inflating his prices behind the shelter of these extreme tariffs he would not so strenuously cling to them. The people are thus mulcted to the extent of several hundred millions annually.

The silk schedule is clearly prohibitive or excessive from the standpoint of both revenue and competition. Imports of silk manufactures, 1924, were $36,938,000, or less than those of 1921, notwithstanding the great increase in silk consumption in the United States, as heretofore pointed out. The revenues, as I have already stated, also show a decline. The principal silk fabrics, comprising silk in gray and velvets, come in at 55 and 60 per cent, respectively, while the tariff on silk wearing apparel averages more than 70 per cent, with imports of only $7,599,000, of which $6,500,000 constitutes ready-made clothing at 75 per cent. The tariff on handkerchiefs runs from 60 to 90 per cent, with imports of $625,000, which is nominal.

The factory value of domestic silk production, 1923, was $761,322,000; average wages, 10 1/2 per cent. It is manifest that this great class of luxuries, retailing at $1,000,000,000 to $1,250,000,000, should pay more than $17,629,000 tariff revenues into the Federal Treasury, and in order thus to raise this pittance of revenue it is amazing to contemplate the enhanced tariff prices the country is paying on this huge amount of silk goods consumed.

The sugar tariff is 1.764 cents per pound against raw sugar from Cuba and 2.20 cents against imports from other countries, excluding our insular possessions, from which sugar is admitted free. The net revenue to the Treasury from sugar imports for 1924 was $130,401,943. This makes allowance for drawback on sugar reexported. American sugar refineries import the raw, chiefly from Cuba, pay the duty, and refine and sell to the general public. One hundred and seven pounds of raw sugar under the tariff make 100 pounds of refined. Other costs, because of the tariff levy, swells the total cost of refined sugar to near 2 cents a pound. The sugar refining companies must fix their selling price so as to include this 2 cents per pound tariff. The United States in 1925 consumed about 12,342,534,000 pounds of sugar, which at 2 cents per pound amounts to $246,850,000. Of this latter amount $130,401,000 went into the Treasury, leaving near $116,450,000 paid by American consumers of sugar to the beet and cane sugar manufacturers in the United States and our insular possessions.

We imported 6,516,240,000 pounds from Cuba at 1.76 cents tariff, and 75,734,000 pounds from full duty-paying countries at 2.20 cents per pound. When the American sugar refineries, importing from Cuba, fix their price of refined sugar to the public, the beet sugar producer at home and the cane sugar manufacturer in our insular possessions and Louisiana, proceed then to fix their sugar prices along with or very close to the price level of the American sugar refineries. The result is that the prices of our domestic and insular sugar manufacturers and producers include the 2 cents per pound tariff, although they are not subject to any tariff. This 2 cents per pound multiplied by 5,750,559,000, which is the number of pounds of sugar produced in the United States and our insular possessions, gives a total of $115,011,000, which the sugar tariff costs the American consumers in addition to what they pay into the Federal Treasury; or, at the naked tariff of 1.76 cents a pound it would be $100,000,000.

The amount or subsidy goes to the domestic producer in the form of higher prices than he would otherwise be in a situation to charge. For every $5 sugar tariff tax that consumers pay into the Treasury they pay $4 and more to the domestic manufacturer. President Coolidge in his published statement of June 14, 1925, declining to reduce the sugar tariff, gave as one reason that it would mean a revenue loss of $40,000,000. This is paradoxical, because he was even then urging a reduction of income taxes and Treasury revenues. May the country be saved from this selfish sort of economic philosophy!

Agricultural tariffs call for special comment. Figures have already been cited revealing the great strides of both agriculture and industry to 1921, and of the continued expansion of manufacturing industry since that time. The story of agriculture for the years 1921-1925 is tragic. The value of farm lands alone declined 31 per cent, or $17,000,000,000. This colossal loss, together with abnormal losses on farm products, make the farmer $25,000,000,000 to $30,000,000,000 worse off than in 1920, and worse off than he was before the war, despite unprecedented high tariffs on all agricultural products since May, 1921. His indebtedness aggregates near $12,000,000,000. Most countries have erected tariff barriers against his export surpluses. Farm failures during past years increased 1,000 per cent in contrast with commercial failures. Near $8,000,000,000 of our $10,500,000,000 loans made abroad since the war have been placed in Canada and South and Central America, where they would aid exports of our finished manufactures, but would not aid our food exports to Europe. The farmer has seen high tariffs thoroughly tried out in practice, and if he can not now see that he is receiving tariff burdens and not tariff benefits it would be in vain to reason with him. The absurdity of 20 cents a bushel on barley, 15 cents on corn, 15 cents on oats and rye, 42 cents on wheat, 3 cents a pound on fresh beef!

Agriculture has never gone to the heart of the tariff question; but should it fail soon to do so, it is destined to a state of permanent decay in this country. There is no more sound economic law than that tariffs are helpless to benefit an industry with a substantial surplus which must be annually sold abroad in competition with important quantities of like products from other countries. The American farmer, therefore, who produces of the total agricultural output some 80 to 85 per cent of the staple agricultural products, such as corn, cotton, wheat, oats, rye, hay, lard, meat products, and tobacco, much of which must be exported, can not hope to receive any appreciable tariff benefits. The existing tariffs, on the contrary, hurt the American farmer by (1) increasing his production costs, (2) his cost of living, (3) his transportation rates on both land and sea, (4) decreasing his foreign markets and his exports, and (5) decreasing his property value by surplus congestion. The tariff is a tremendous factor in the farmer's production costs, as it is in his living costs. There is scarcely an article he can purchase for any purpose at a price that is not tariff inflated. His agricultural machinery was placed on the free list, while high duties were imposed on all the materials entering into the same, and the fact that the manufacturer dominates the world compels the farmer to pay high-tariff prices just the same. While the inevitable logic of high tariffs is that home production should not exceed home consumption ultraprotectionists are striving to expand the exports of industry while they are advising the farmer to restrict his output to the home demand. They tell him that he should be content with home markets. In the first place, the farmer's home market is secure, regardless of tariffs; secondly, of what concern is the home or any market to the farmer unless he can sell at a price above the cost of production? The farmer is interested in prices above all else. High-tariff advocates also tell the farmer that his collapse in 1921 was primarily due to commercial depression, whereas in truth the commercial depression was primarily due to the agricultural collapse and loss of purchasing power.

Agriculture continues as the basis of all sound domestic prosperity. Under existing tariff and trade policies industry will soon submerge agriculture and then the rule will be reversed. The farmer undoubtedly knows now just what has been happening to him during the past five years. In 1920 the exports of all foodstuffs and food animals were $2,034,000,000, compared with similar exports of $892,000,000 in 1925. Only 17 per cent of our imports of foodstuffs in 1925 were competitive. Attempts are at times made to mislead the farmer by pointing to the large volume of agricultural importations. They dodge the controlling facts that most importations of foodstuffs are tropical fruits, coffee, sugar, tea, and other products that we do not produce at all, or if so, in insufficient quantities. Tea, coffee, sugar, spices, and cocoa comprise $620,000,000 of food imports for 1925. We produce none of these except some sugar. We must import wool and Egyptian cotton to the extent of $162,000,000 unless we are to freeze; raw silks amounted to $396,000,000 and crude rubber to $437,000,000. We produce neither. A fair volume of winter fruits and vegetables come in from southern countries at a time not to compete with our own. We do not produce enough hides, and so we purchased $96,000,000 of hides in 1925.

These are the principal scarecrow items of agricultural imports. There will naturally and inevitably filter into this country sporadic items of competitive imports, such as 12,635,000 pounds of fresh beef in 1924, but since we eat more than 7,000,000,000 pounds of beef annually, this insignificant quantity would not afford rations for two meals. It is these small dribblets of imported foodstuffs which come in in the natural course of international trade, tariffs or no tariffs, on which protectionists base their plea to the farmer. I am not discussing here a few minor agricultural specialties in this country which now and then claim some tariff advantages, but which comprise scarcely more than 15 per cent of American agriculture. One class of wheat growers now and then gets a slight whiff of tariff benefits, in no sense comparable to his injuries or to the far broader benefits he would derive from moderate tariffs, with the result that he is enlisted in support of all high-tariff programs.

This is in the face of the fact that probably three-fourths of the time competitive wheat in Winnipeg is higher than in Minneapolis, with the result that the American grower gets virtually nothing except some advantage against price fluctuations across the border, which occasionally occur. What most generally happens is that American and Canadian wheat moves on parallel routes to the world market in Liverpool, where they meet in competition and where the price of our domestic wheat at home is measurably fixed.

It is thus seen that mountainous tariff rates which are utterly meaningless are scooped out to the farmer, while he in return supports such unconscionable rates on iron and steel products, wearing apparel, house furnishings, and others I have detailed, which are wholly effective in increasing the prices of all articles and commodities the farmer must purchase. Under the existing tariff and related economic policies there is an irreconcilable conflict between industry and agriculture in this country. I am opposed to destroying one for the benefit of the other. I favor such fair and constructive treatment of both as will conserve and develop them to the fullest possible extent.

In conclusion, the Fordney law was written for protection and not for revenue. The increased revenues from the manufacture of the four great industries, iron and steel, cotton, wool, and silk, with products retailing at more than $15,000,000,000, were less than $20,000,000 for 1924 over the Treasury revenues of 1921. The Coolidge administration continues to pile up tariff taxes under the flexible provision, while it preaches internal-revenue tax reduction. The increase in imports has comprised either price increases or increases of materials for finished manufacturing, chiefly to supply our largely increased domestic consumption of finished products. With pre-war and post-war values equalized, imports were $2,550,000,000 for 1913; $2,898,000,000 for 1921; $3,367,000,000 for 1922; $3,792,000,000 for 1923; $3,611,000,000 for 1924, and $4,228,000,000 for 1925. The imports of dutiable finished manufactures for 1924 are less than in 1914, notwithstanding our tremendous business expansion.

Many finished articles ready for consumption which the people wear and use as stated were transferred from the free to the dutiable list by the Fordney law. Burlap is one of such articles made dutiable. Deducting burlap imports of $85,000,000 for 1925 for the sake of comparison, we have the following imports of dutiable finished manufactures, which are $321,810,000 for 1914, $350,922,000 for 1921, and $442,000,000 for 1925. Equalizing 1914 values with 1925 values shows imports of $465,450,000 for 1914, compared with $442,000,000 for 1925. And again, imports of finished cotton, silk, and wool manufactures for 1921 were $175,000,000, as compared with $161,000,000 for 1924.

These outstanding and amazing facts expose the big fraud in the Fordney rates. The metals schedule, for example, averages 49.32 per cent ad valorem, the highest since the average of the McKinley Act in 1893-94.

Save for loans of $10,500,000,000 and gold imports of near $2,000,000,000, the volume of our exports during recent years would have been humiliatingly and disastrously low, while large overproduction in many industries would have created stagnation and idleness of labor and capital at home. The excess of exports for the 10 years 1916-1925 was $22,500,000,000. It is folly longer to continue the great productive plant of the Nation—the greatest of all time—in a high-tariff strait-jacket. Taking as a basis $26,000,000,000 the increase of factory value of domestic products by manufacture, which is ultra conservative, if we assume that the Fordney tariff increases prices an average of 15 per cent to the American people, a tariff cost of $3,900,000,000 in prices in excess of a reasonable price is the result. During the present period of high prices this is extremely conservative. A high-tariff policy means the writing of tariffs by the beneficiaries and their constant jacking up to higher levels under the flexible provision, with the result that correspondingly higher artificial prices—prices out of line with world prices—are brought about. This condition will later even invite imports and also will destroy finished exports. Import tariffs do not aid exports, but correspondingly depress them.

America is no weakling, but an economic giant, standing at the head of the column of nations in finance and industrial efficiency and capacity, and she can not maintain a healthy growth in an industrial hothouse. Why wait for a crisis or a panic before correcting unsound policies? The rights and the welfare of both industry and agriculture alike must be recognized and promoted, and this can not be done through a system of ultra high tariffs. The flexible provision as an agency of tariff reduction is a colossal failure.

The existing tariffs should be reduced gradually and with careful regard for industry, which has been accustomed to artificial stimulants and influences. There should be no disposition to destroy or materially injure any efficient industry economically justifiable in this country. From the standpoint of adequate tariff protection even there is room to-day for a great economic issue on whether the enormous excesses and abuses in the Fordney law shall be eliminated. The Republican Party, however, is not the agency through which even this partial and patriotic step can be taken. That party has been the faithful servant of the extreme high tariff manufacturer since the Civil War. The latter has furnished the chief finances for that party during campaigns, and in turn has dominated the Republican national leadership with respect to its important legislative and other national policies. The result has been that the Republican organization has left colossal scandals and wholesale corruption in its trail during the past 60 years. It would be idle to propose honest tariff revision through the Republican Party. This would be equivalent to a proposal that the chief tariff beneficiaries themselves should revise the tariff. We have but to recall their fraudulent tariff revisions of 1884 and 1909. The ghost of Banquo did not disturb Macbeth's party more than a hint at tariff revision frightens high-tariff champions. It would be necessary for the Republican Party first to reform itself before reforming the tariff. It is helpless to do either.

The Democratic Party alone, disinterested, fair, and friendly as it is toward every class of legitimate business and every section of the country, can be looked to to revise the tariff to a moderate or competitive level for revenue, to establish fair and liberal trade policies and methods, and, in brief, to restore to this country sound economic policies, both domestic and international.

The conclusion is inescapable that under mossback, reactionary Republican rule the small group of extreme high-tariff manufacturers are in complete control. They dominate the Government; they in every practical sense are the Government. They have degraded our political life to the lowest level in history. All minor groups seeking special Government favors must operate through this all-powerful high-tariff group which constitutes the real citadel of what is known as special privilege. It is folly to condemn minor acts and policies of Government favoritism and to attempt to prosecute a program for their suppression until the strongly entrenched high-tariff group is first attacked, dislodged, and divorced from the Government. Some political party must resolutely enter upon this righteous task; and unless it is ready to turn its back on all its great traditions, principles, and achievements in opposition to vicious class legislation, governmental favoritism, and government by a class, the Democratic Party will welcome the combat.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection?

Mr. LA GUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman on what subject?

Mr. HUDSON. For the purpose of asking unanimous consent to insert in the Record a letter addressed to me.

Mr. LA GUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, still further reserving the right to object, I would like to follow the gentleman for one minute, because the gentleman has kindly informed me of the subject matter of the letter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York also asks unanimous consent to speak for one minute. Is there objection to these requests?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, on March 24 in the Record, on page 6174, and succeeding pages, my colleague from New York [Mr. LA GUARDIA] brought to the attention of the House certain matters connected with the famous Remus case, and in connection therewith brought to the attention of the House one Franklin L. Dodge. Mr. Frank Dodge, the father of this gentleman, has been a lifelong resident of my home city, Lansing, Mich., and he is a highly honored and respected attorney of that city. Mr. Franklin L. Dodge is not known to me personally, but I have his letter addressed to me under date of April 10, in which he refutes the charges read into the Record by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LA GUARDIA], and I ask unanimous consent to insert that letter in the Record.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to insert in the Record the letter referred to. Is there objection?

Mr. LA GUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and in the minute granted to me by the House, I desire to state that I made no charges against the father of Franklin L. Dodge, whom I will concede is a gentleman of very high standing in the gentleman's community. I want to inform the House that my information was taken from sworn affidavits, depositions, and examinations before trial under oath.

Mr. HUDSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LA GUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. HUDSON. Is it not a fact that the case is now on trial before the courts and has not been decided?

Mr. LA GUARDIA. I stated on examinations before trial under oath by order of the court. I do not want to extend these affidavits in the Record, because the very character of the case is such that the information in these affidavits is not of a nature that the membership of the House wants in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I serve notice on the House that I will obtain certified copies of the sworn testimony and file it with the clerk of the Committee on the Judiciary so that the membership of the House may obtain the information from the same authentic source that I obtained it. I shall not object to the gentleman's request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

LETTER FROM FRANKLIN L. DODGE, OF CLEVELAND, OHIO

The letter is as follows:

CLEVELAND, OHIO, April 10, 1926.

Hon. GRANT M. HUDSON,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: My attention has been called to a speech by Congressman LA GUARDIA, of New York, appearing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for Wednesday, March 24, 1926, on pages 6174, 6175, and 6176, in which he attacks my character and my conduct both in public and private life. I feel in justice to myself and my family that the Congress of the United States and the public ought to be placed in possession of the facts.

The charges are absolutely false; I deny them without qualification; they have no foundation in fact and the attack upon me is wholly unwarranted and manifestly unfair.

The provisions of section 6 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States preclude me from instituting any legal proceedings against Mr. LA GUARDIA for making and causing the publication of those charges in the course of his remarks on that occasion, and I must therefore content myself with presenting the true facts concerning the matters to which he referred in the form of a letter to you which I feel, in fairness, should appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and be given as wide publicity as the remarks of Mr. LA GUARDIA.

The charges were made by Mr. LA GUARDIA, but in my judgment he was the instrument by means of which George Remus placed before the Congress and the people of the United States his propaganda to ruin and blacken the fair name of his wife, Mrs. Imogene Remus, and to attempt to ruin my reputation and bring disgrace to an honorable family, of which I am a member. In the language of the Bible—

"The voice is Jacob's voice, but the hands are the hands of Esau," (Genesis, 27: 2.)

It is my belief that Mr. LA GUARDIA in making these charges has unwittingly become the tool of George Remus, one of the most unscrupulous men who ever immigrated to and resided in this country.

Mr. LA GUARDIA said on page 6176 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on March 24, 1926:

"He violated another statute of the United States while in the employ of the Department of Justice, and he was permitted to resign."

I deny that I was permitted to resign as a special agent of the Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice because I violated a statute of the United States. I resigned to accept a position with the investigation department of the National Credit Men's Association. During the later part of June, 1925, the investigation department of the National Credit Men's Association entered into negotiations with me with a view of having me enter its employ to do investigative work, and on or about the 11th day of June, 1925, I transmitted my resignation to the Bureau of Investigation, Department of Justice, Washington, D. C., to take effect at its pleasure, and the said resignation was accepted effective on August 10, 1925. I defy any person to point to any act of commission or omission during my entire official life inconsistent with the proper discharge of my official duties.

I was assigned to some of the most important cases under investigation by the Government during my connection with it, and I do not hesitate to say that I can properly point with pride to the manner in which I handled the investigation of those cases and the results obtained by me under very difficult circumstances. In the performance of my duties I was thrown in contact with men who were using their talents and their wits to violate the laws of the United States and escape punishment for their offenses, and on one occasion I was offered 100 one thousand dollar bills if I would permit a certain person to escape the punishment which my work made it possible to impose upon him under the law. I thank God that I was true to my trust and that I did not for a moment swerve a hair's breadth from the path of duty. Of course, in my investigative work I had to enter and live in an environment at times which was not of my choosing, but in the performance of my duties it was not for me to reason why, but to do and die. It has often been said that republics are ungrateful. I have never been a cynic, but when I read the speech of Congressman LA GUARDIA attacking me and my record made on the floor of the House of Representatives of my country, I could not help but think that after all there was a grain of truth in that saying.

During my employment with the Government of the United States I never knew that George Remus or his wife, Mrs. Imogene Remus, owned or possessed any whisky certificates. Neither did I know anything about their property or their domestic affairs.

I never met Mrs. Imogene Remus until January 16, 1925. I met her in the presence of her husband in the Clark County jail at Athens, Ga., where George Remus, her husband, was confined at that time, and I was introduced to her by George Remus himself in the presence of United States District Attorney Clint W. Hager, of Atlanta, Ga., and Capt. Charles Redding, assistant United States attorney, of Savannah, Ga., who were with me at the time on official business connected with the investigation of certain alleged irregularities in the conduct of the United States penitentiary at Atlanta, Ga.

Thereafter I saw Mrs. Imogene Remus in the presence of her husband occasionally in the United States district attorney's office at Atlanta, Ga., when her husband, George Remus, was brought from Athens, Ga., to the Federal building at Atlanta, Ga., to testify before the grand jury at Atlanta, Ga., which grand jury was then investigating alleged irregularities in the conduct of the United States penitentiary, and to which grand jury there was being presented the evidence secured through the investigation conducted by myself and other Federal officials, and during the first trial of Warden Sartain and other penipenitentiary officials at Atlanta, Ga., during the month of February, 1925, in the Federal building in the presence of her husband, George Remus, who had been brought from Athens, Ga., to Atlanta, Ga., as a witness for the Government during the said trial in February, 1925. During his stay in Atlanta, Ga., at this time he was guarded by Max Goldman, of Athens, Ga., and during the daytime was kept in the United States attorney's office, Atlanta, Ga., and at night in the Robert Fulton Hotel, in Atlanta, Ga., always under the surveillance of Max Goldman and other guards, and Mrs. Remus was permitted by the guards to be with him on these occasions.

I was never in the presence of Mrs. Remus at Atlanta, Ga., or at Athens, Ga., or at any other place at any time except when she was in the presence of her husband or members of her family or friends or her attorney. I was never alone with her at any time or at any place in my life.

Mr. LA GUARDIA, in his speech, on page 6174, is recorded as saying:

"While he was investigating the conduct of the warden and other officials he became very friendly with the wife of the prisoner, Remus, and the conduct in the very warden's office is too obscene to relate at this time."

That charge is absolutely untrue. The depositions taken on behalf of Mrs. Imogene Remus and on file in the court of common pleas, division of domestic relations for the county of Hamilton and State of Ohio, at Cincinnati, Ohio, in the case entitled Imogene Remus v. George Remus, docket No. 196557, absolutely disprove that charge.

The foundation for that statement of Mr. LA GUARDIA no doubt is an ex parte deposition made on behalf of George Remus by one Vernon R. Chumbley, who served two terms of imprisonment in the United States penitentiary at Atlanta, Ga., and one term of imprisonment at the United States penitentiary at Leavenworth, Kans., and who, I understand, at one time was also confined in the State insane asylum in Tennessee.

The depositions of Warden John W. Snook, the present warden of the United States penitentiary, and other penitentiary officials on file in the above-entitled case at Cincinnati, Ohio, prove to a moral certainty that that charge is absolutely false. On March 19, upon motion of former Common Pleas Judge Edward T. Dixon, of Cincinnati, Ohio, counsel for Mrs. Remus, the cross petition naming me correspondent and the ex parte depositions filed by George Remus were thrown out of court. Every charge of improper conduct on my part with Mrs. Imogene Remus is shown to be false by the testimony contained in the depositions on file in that case and at the hearing of the divorce case I expect to be present to take the witness stand to meet the charges made against me by George Remus in his cross petition and by Mr. LA GUARDIA in his speech delivered on March 24, 1926.

Mr. LA GUARDIA's speech is replete with inaccuracies. The reader who is not in possession of the facts irresistibly comes to the conclusion that I was endeavoring to keep George Remus in the penitentiary, in jail, or in the workhouse at Dayton, Ohio, in order that I might enjoy the society of his wife and the use of his property, and that I was instrumental in having his bail in connection with the indictment pending against him in the district court of the United States at St. Louis, Mo., fixed at $50,000, and that I had something to do with the institution of proceedings in the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit at Cincinnati, Ohio, through which the Government of the United States is seeking to reverse the ruling of the United States district judge, Smith Hickenlopper, in allowing the writ of habeas corpus.

I had nothing to do with the investigation of the offense involved in the illegal removal of whisky from the Jack Daniels distillery at St. Louis, Mo., during the summer and fall of 1923 and the returning of an indictment against George Remus and his codefendants in that case. I was never assigned to the investigation of that crime and never knew such a crime was committed and had no knowledge that the facts concerning that offense were being investigated and that such facts had been presented to a Federal grand jury until I read in the newspapers of the return of the indictment at St. Louis, Mo. I never had and have not now any official knowledge of that offense and the evidence in the possession of the Government to prove the allegations of that indictment.

If Mr. LA GUARDIA had taken the trouble to make an investigation, he would have learned that the amount of the bond in that case was fixed upon the recommendation of Hon. Havath E. Mau, United States attorney at Cincinnati, Ohio, and that at that time Mr. Remus was not a Government witness but a fugitive from justice.

I never spoke to Mr. Mau on that subject in my life. My guess is that the bond was fixed at that amount because George Remus was the archconspirator and the master mind in the conspiracy which brought about the illegal removal of the whisky from the Jack Daniels distillery at St. Louis, Mo., and its diversion into unlawful channels. Mr. Remus's bond was furnished by a professional bondsman, and some time after his release he appeared before the grand jury at Indianapolis, Ind., and, I understand, testified before that grand jury, and although he was the archconspirator in the conspiracy case presented to the grand jury he received immunity for his testimony and was not indicted, though he himself had been indicted for the same transaction by the United States grand jury at St. Louis, Mo.

I had nothing whatsoever to do with the error proceedings instituted by the Government in the United States circuit court of appeals at Cincinnati, Ohio, to have the court of appeals pass upon the question whether the sentence of imprisonment of one year in the workhouse at Dayton, Ohio, was to be served concurrently with his sentence of two years in the United States penitentiary at Atlanta, Ga.

I never discussed that question with any Government official in my life, and I was not instrumental in having those proceedings instituted. My judgment is that those proceedings are being pressed because of the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the case entitled United States of America, petitioner, v. James Daugherty, argued December 1, 1925, and decided January 4, 1926.

I never offered to sell whisky certificates to George W. Wallenstein, 30 Broad Street, New York City, nor did I ever use the name of John Gray, of Cleveland, Ohio, in that or any other connection.

The statement of Mr. LA GUARDIA, appearing on page 6176 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 24, 1926, does not contain a word of truth. If Mr. LA GUARDIA has made an investigation, he would have learned that the whisky certificates belonging to Mr. Remus had been hypothecated by him in connection with the purchase by him of a distillery at Utica, N. Y., and that part of the whisky certificates which he hypothecated in that connection are forged and spurious whisky certificates. If Mr. LA GUARDIA had made an investigation, he would have learned that it was the practice of Mr. Remus to forge and counterfeit whisky certificates and to cheat and double-cross those with whom he transacted business.

Mr. LA GUARDIA in the course of his remarks charged me with attempting to bootleg Remus's whisky and to divert whisky into bootleg channels. His statements in that connection are also untrue.

Mr. Mat Hinkel, to whom Mr. LA GUARDIA also referred in his speech, is a man of upright character and a man of honor and integrity.

Mr. LA GUARDIA in the course of his remarks refers to a libel proceeding in Indianapolis, Ind., against 1,500 cases of whisky seized by the Prohibition Department at the Squibb Distillery at Lawrenceburg, Ind. I know nothing about that proceeding. I never had anything to do with it while in the Government service or since I left the Government service. I have learned, however, that those 1,500 cases of whisky was whisky which George Remus was attempting to divert into unlawful channels and that in order to save it for himself he caused Miss Blanche Watson, of Covington, Ky., to claim it as her whisky.

The district court at Indianapolis and the circuit court of appeals at Chicago, however, did not seem to put much faith in her claim and ordered the whisky confiscated to the United States.

As I said before, I have never had anything to do with this whisky and never saw it, and I had nothing to do with its custody, but Mr. Remus's action in connection with these 1,500 cases and his reference to the alleged diversion of 350 cases out of the 1,500 cases is in line with his past conduct. He is like the thief who cries "stop thief" to divert attention from himself to someone else.

George Remus is an atheist. He has no regard for the laws of God or man. He immigrated to the United States when a young man and is still unnaturalized. He claims to be a citizen by virtue of the naturalization of his father, and his claim to citizenship is false, as he well knows.

While practicing law in the city of Chicago he was notorious as a framer of evidence in divorce cases. He was disbarred from practicing law in the courts of that city. He was expelled from membership in the Masonic Order and the Illinois Athletic Club.

His first wife, Lillian Hansen Remus, instituted divorce proceedings against him on March 5, 1915, in the circuit court of Cook County, Docket No. B 9121, alleging that he addressed her with the most obscene, opprobrious, and violent language and was guilty of extreme and repeated cruelty against her and threatened her life and made her life miserable and violently attacked her and struck her on the face and head, and otherwise ill-treated her.

On April 7, 1915, she withdrew her petition for divorce against George Remus and caused the same to be dismissed upon his most urgent entreaties and promises, but his conduct toward her was such that on February 27, 1919, she again instituted divorce proceedings, alleging substantially the same acts of cruelty, and on March 3, 1919, a decree was entered in the superior court of Cook County, No. 342061, granting her divorce from George Remus on the grounds set forth in her petition.

He married Mrs. Imogene Remus on June 25, 1920, at Newport, Ky., and from that very moment, as the depositions show, he has been guilty of extreme cruelty toward her, and under threats and fear of bodily harm has caused her to do his bidding and brought untold agony, humiliation, degradation, and shame upon herself and family by reason of his repeated violations of law and conviction and confinement in the United States penitentiary.

His egotism knows no bounds. To satisfy his vanity he had a large tombstone erected upon his family lot in Chicago, and under his direction it was located at such a point upon the family lot that the coffin containing the body of his father had to be cut in two in the construction of its foundation, and it has been his boast that after his death he desires to have a tombstone placed over his body bearing the inscription, "Here lies George Remus, the king of the bootleggers."

I have no property belonging to Mrs. Remus. I never received any property of whatsoever nature from Mrs. Imogene Remus at any time. I have not now nor never have had any property belonging to George Remus.

The title and ownership of the property claimed by George Remus is in litigation in connection with several suits pending in the court of common pleas of Hamilton County, Ohio, and the title and ownership of the whisky certificates which it is charged have been sold to M. J. Hinkel, of Cleveland, Ohio, are in litigation in a case pending in the Mason County circuit at Maysville, in the State of Kentucky. Those tribunals have the power to determine the questions involved and no doubt will decide the issues according to the law and facts. All of his property is hidden away in safety deposit boxes in various parts of the country and he recently made an investment in Florida real estate.

The statements of Mr. LAGUARDIA are as false as the statements of George Remus made before the so-called Wheeler investigating committee and repeated in various newspaper articles to the effect that he gave the late Jesse Smith $250,000 for protection. The fact is that George Remus never knew or talked to Jesse Smith at any time or on any occasion. He asked to come before the Senate investigating committee so that he might have a vacation for a number of weeks from confinement in the United States penitentiary at Atlanta, Ga., and in order that he might achieve newspaper notoriety, knowing that his statement could not be contradicted by a dead man.

I again deny, without qualification, all of the charges made against me in the speech of Mr. LAGUARDIA in the House of Representatives on Wednesday, March 24, 1926, and contained on pages 6174, 6175, and 6176 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on that date.

Respectfully,

FRANKLIN L. DODGE.

THOMAS JEFFERSON

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial written by former United States Senator William E. Chilton, of West Virginia, on Thomas Jefferson, which appeared in the Charleston, W. Va., Gazette of April 13, 1926.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

THOMAS JEFFERSON

Whether Thomas Jefferson was born, as he said, on April 2, or, as some of the encyclopedias say, on April 13, constitutional freemen all over the world will in this month, consciously or unconsciously, pay a tribute of respect and love to the man, the patriot, the philosopher, the naturalist, the historian, the statesman, and the politician who accomplished more with his pen and his example to anchor in our institutions the true safeguards of liberty than any other American. He won, as he deserved, the confidence of the public to such an extent that, even while he was minister to France, his advice was sought by the leaders of America in framing the Constitution, and after he had retired to private life and had settled down at Monticello to enjoy the quiet of a farmer's life his opinion was sought and freely given, not only by Americans but by strugglers for liberty all over the world.

History does not give anything but the high spots of his life. The school children know that he wrote the Declaration of Independence, was the leader in Virginia in abolishing the law of primogeniture, and wrote the clause in the Virginia constitution divorcing church from state; was minister to France, member of the House of Burgesses of Virginia, member of the Continental Congress, Governor of Virginia, Secretary of State in Washington's Cabinet, Vice President of the United States, and President of the United States from 1801 to 1809, and that he seized the opportunity to buy from France the Louisiana territory which embraces most of the United States west of the Mississippi River. His fight for the general education of the people crowns him as the author of our free-school system, and his founding of the University of Virginia shows that he believed in higher education. It is not in politics, as modernly understood, that he reached his high place in the hearts of freemen. To him public office was merely an opportunity for service. To him glory and honor must come by merit and achievements, and this field is open in private life as well as public.

In the epitaph which he suggested for his monument, no mention is made of his holding public office. The three things which he suggested for the shaft over his grave were the authorship of the Declaration of Independence, the Virginia resolution for religious freedom, and the founding of the University of Virginia. These he regarded as achievements of lasting merit. In his mind anyone could be Secretary of State, Vice President, or President, but to prepare a chart of freedom, such as the Declaration of Independence; to lead a people like the Virginians, whose forefathers had been accustomed to an established church, and to whom primogeniture was a part of the warp and woof of the organization of society, to discard these things and organize themselves upon the new idea, that an individual's relation to his God was his own affair, and that, since all men were born free and equal before the law, the law of primogeniture was a violation of that doctrine, required ability, patience, courage, and all the elements of great leadership. It takes close research into the innermost workings of politics and government, and patient investigation of the current literature of the times to understand the herculean task before Jefferson when he organized the Republican, now known as the Democratic, party.

Washington, Adams, Patrick Henry, Charles Carroll, John Rutledge, Luther Martin, John Marshall, Fisher Ames, and J. A. Bayard belonged to the party of Alexander Hamilton, in many respects one of the great men of the world. Hamilton was a consummate politician as well as a learned, thoughtful statesman and philosopher. He was a financier who stood as premier in his class, in the judgment of the world. As Secretary of the Treasury in Washington's Cabinet, Hamilton took charge of the finances of the young Republic when it was in debt and without resources and boldly fought and schemed until he got the National Government to assume the debts of the States, contracted during the Revolutionary War, and at once so organized the finances of the country that its obligations immediately went to par, its credit was restored, and the industrial institutions of the country became prosperous. It took courage and sacrifice upon Hamilton's part to do this, because the States were jealous of their institutions, and they feared the power of a strong Government. However, when the success of Hamilton's plans became evident, and the people, under the influence of the confidence which that success inspired, went to work, Hamilton was probably the most popular and highly respected man in the United States. He was a frank, manly, courageous man, who could maintain a cause in any company, and he was not backward in taking charge for the Federalist Party, in its eminently successful days during the administration of Washington from the adoption of the Constitution until 1797. Washington trusted Hamilton, because he understood the latter's ability and was grateful for his eminent services to the country.

When Washington retired from office Alexander Hamilton was the acknowledged leader of the Federalists, and his word was practically law. He was the "leader of the leaders" of that party, and these leaders sought his opinion and relied upon his judgment with implicit faith. There was one thing about Alexander Hamilton which prevented Jefferson from being in political sympathy with him. They were good friends and Jefferson trusted in Hamilton's honesty. But in the Constitutional Convention Hamilton had advocated a life term for the President and for the Senators. He did not believe in popular government. His idea was that the intelligence and the wealth of a country should govern it. He expressed himself frankly to this effect, and his appeal was always to the men of wealth and intelligence, feeling that the great masses of the people were not competent to manage public affairs.

Jefferson was a landowner and a slave owner, and was as much subject to the charge of being an aristocrat as anyone in Virginia. But he had that peculiar power that enabled him to divorce himself from his own interests and environment and to look deep into the merits and philosophy of every problem and the vision to look forward to the future. He saw at once that the doctrines of Hamilton were consistent only with a monarchy, and his heart longed for a new experiment in the New World, with a truly representative government, in which the people at frequent intervals could express themselves at the polls and name their own representatives and fashion their own laws. He saw that the necessary tendency of Hamilton's policies was toward plutocracy and the government of the few, and his knowledge of human nature taught him that the guaranties of the Constitution would be a mere mockery under such a government. He knew that there could be good monarchs but no good monarchies, good plutocrats but no good plutocracies. He understood that life is short and that the underlying principles of government could not be built around the life of any good man, not even Washington. A wise and humane king, like Gustavus Adolphus, was merely a king for one life and might be succeeded by a monster. Marcus Aurelius in Jefferson's eyes held for a span a position, to be disgraced later by some hereditary tyrant or imbecile. He could find no way of evading the note of humanity and justice in the Declaration of Independence that all men must be equal before the law, and this he could not reconcile with hereditary kings or life tenures. His insistence upon a bill of rights and specific guaranties came from his wise deductions that powers grasped or assumed by good officials for commendable purposes could be used by bad officials to rob or enslave the people. He foresaw that the resources of this country would develop immense wealth for the few, and he understood that there would be complicated problems arising out of the motley population which would be coming to this free country, and that our differences in soil, climate, and local habits and customs would make diversified and complex interests, which could not be accommodated to anything but a popular government, based upon the intelligence and the virtue of all the people. Hence he wanted the people educated and then vested with the burden of preserving these free institutions.

The views of Hamilton were put to the test during the administration of John Adams, whose administration was Federalist in the extreme, and was without the poise and the humane ideals which Washington had put into the Government. Jefferson saw that almost any kind of a policy would be all right under a man like George Washington, but the country found out that the ideas of Hamilton would not work under a man like John Adams. The latter and his leaders forced upon the country the alien and sedition laws, under which a free press and free speech were denied to the country, and some of the best citizens were dragged before partisan courts and put into dungeons for expressing their opinions of Government and its officials. Even the adherence of Washington to the Federalist Party could not save it, after such an exhibition of the difference between Hamilton's doctrines, in the hands of weak men, and Jefferson's principles. The result was, the founding of the Democratic Party, the election of Jefferson to the presidency, and the enthronement of that interpretation of the Constitution which has given the people popular government and has gradually removed all the restriction upon the franchise.

The greatest compliment to Jefferson is the fact that every political party which has ever been organized and has reached a national status has professed to be founded upon his principles. He was not a mere idealist. He was practical, sensible, thoroughly human, reasonable, tolerant, just. In his lifetime he was called a liar, a revolutionist, an atheist, and looked upon by the select wealthy few as an enemy to law and order; and yet he could not be tempted to advise anything but orderly, constitutional methods, and remedies. His obsession was that there could not be, in a Democratic republic, a few born to rule, while the great masses paid the bill and must take what is handed to them by their supposed superiors. By this rule he squared every contention about the Constitution. He was jealous of the power of Federal courts and predicted that these courts would, on account of the life tenure of the judges, become arbitrary and ready to grasp at powers not intended to be conferred upon them. For this he was criticized and called an enemy of courts, but the conflicts of jurisdiction between State and Federal courts since have fully demonstrated that his foresight was beyond that of any other living American of his time. In the temptation to take short cuts, in the demand to have bureaucratic government, which seems now to possess all branches of government, and in the solution of the complex problems which our wealth and resourcefulness have precipitated, there can be no permanence under any other policy than that of Thomas Jefferson.

If we solve a difficult question to-day by the time-serving methods of Hamilton, we only make a precedent for those who happen to be on the other side, to spring when they get into power. Jefferson's theory was, that if the people make mistakes, so do kings. He understood that it is human to err, and that governments must be founded so as to make it easy to correct errors. His broad mind comprehended the fact that confidence is not one-sided. No one has the complete confidence of another unless he gives that other his complete confidence. No people can be trusted unless they are trusted, and Jefferson saw no way, nor has the mind of man yet conceived a way, by which there can be a successful government of the people so organized or managed that a few can seize it.

INDEBTEDNESS OF ITALY TO THE UNITED STATES

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6773) to authorize the settlement of the indebtedness of the Kingdom of Italy to the United States of America.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to inquire if there is any Senator who desires to speak on the Italian debt settlement.

If not, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside.

PETITION AND MEMORIAL

Mr. OVERMAN presented a petition of sundry citizens of Catawba County in the State of North Carolina, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed in the RECORD without the names, as follows:

PETITION TO CONGRESS AGAINST COMPULSORY SUNDAY OBSERVANCE

Believing—

1. In the American principle of the complete separation of church and state;
2. That Congress is barred by the first amendment to the Constitution from enacting any law enforcing "the Lord's day" as "holy time," or establishing religious observances by civil legislation, or giving one "sect or sects" an advantage above others;
3. That the observance of "the Lord's day" as "holy time" is an act of worship, and that honorable "labor," "amusements," "entertainments," and "secular business" can be forbidden only for religious reasons on Sunday;
4. That such legislation is detrimental to the best interests of both church and state; and
5. That all such legislation by Congress establishes a dangerous precedent, is unjust, discriminatory, religious, un-American, and unconstitutional, and should be opposed by every American lover of liberty of conscience and of true American ideals of freedom in religion: Therefore

We, the undersigned, adult residents of Catawba County, State of North Carolina, earnestly petition your honorable body not to pass any of the following compulsory Sunday observance bills, H. R. 10311, H. R. 10123, H. R. 7179, or H. R. 7822, now pending, or any other compulsory religious measure that may be introduced. HEIGHT OF BUILDINGS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the bill (H. R. 9398) to amend an act regulating the height of buildings in the District of Columbia, approved June 1, 1910, has been on the calendar for a number of days. I have sought to have it taken up for consideration pursuant to promise. It relates to the National Press Club Building. It is quite important that a speedy disposition shall be made of the bill because financial arrangements must be entered into or consummated respecting its construction. I am opposed to the bill, but I feel that the Senate ought to have an opportunity to act upon it. I therefore ask unanimous consent that we may proceed to its consideration. It will take but a little while.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Utah?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 9398) to amend an act regulating the height of buildings in the District of Columbia, approved June 1, 1910, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an act entitled "An act to regulate the height of buildings in the District of Columbia," approved June 1, 1910, be, and it is hereby, amended by adding at the end of paragraph 5 of said act the following proviso:

"And further provided, That the building to be erected on lots 813, 814, and 820, in square 254, located on the southeast corner of Fourteenth and F Streets NW., be permitted to be erected to a height not to exceed 140 feet above the F Street curb."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I regret that I can not see my way clear to support the pending measure. The people of Washington as well as the people of the Nation have been and are interested in the Capital of this Republic. There is a universal desire that it shall be a beautiful city, architecturally and artistically, and in harmony with those standards which should apply to the Capital of this great democratic Republic. Nations have been judged by their architecture. Buildings have voices and speak not only to the age in which they are constructed, but to succeeding ages.

If Washington had been constructed in conformity with the plan which was in the minds of Washington and L'Enfant, it would have presented a more beautiful appearance than it does to-day. One does not need to be aesthetic or artistic to appreciate how woefully lacking Washington is in those elements of beauty—architectural and otherwise—which should characterize the city of the greatest Nation in the world.

For years we have been building without a plan, and the pleas of those who have been solicitous for the proper development of the city have too often fallen upon deaf ears. Streets dedicated to residences have been and are being destroyed for such purposes, physical and construction irregularities in all parts of the city are being permitted, deviations from a system of proper development which would enhance the beauty of the city are permitted with but little protest, the beautiful suburbs are being ruined, undulating hills, crowned with trees, are being destroyed, and additions are being laid out without proper coordination with the city, and sections which should be reserved for residential purposes are being invaded by business houses and street car lines, so that if conditions continue unchecked for two or three more decades, it will be almost impossible to rectify the mistakes made and correct the deformities which have been permitted and are still being permitted.

One does not need to be an artist or an architect or a city planner or possessed of aesthetic tastes in order to understand what these departures mean to the city of Washington and to what extent they impair the beauty of the city and the harmony of its development. From time to time efforts have been made to check the growing evils of which I have spoken and to establish a plan which would meet the desires and ideals and aspirations not only of the people of Washington but the people of the United States. But they have proven if not abortive, at least not wholly successful. And may I add, Mr. President, that the inhabitants of the District of Columbia are not the only ones interested in the Capital City of our country. The people of the United States are taxed to aid in maintaining the District government and in building a beautiful Capital for the Nation. They have a right to expect that the city shall not be marred and that its development shall be along proper lines and that as it is developed, it will more and more challenge the admiration of the world because of its architectural beauty and those characteristics which contribute to the raising of a city to a high standard of artistic beauty.

Washington is not an industrial center. It never will be a Pittsburgh or New York or Chicago. The people of Washington do not wish this, nor do the people of the United States. We are soon to appropriate $50,000,000 for further public buildings. That money comes from the Treasury of the United States and from the taxpayers of our country. The expenditure of that large sum will undoubtedly add to the beauty of Washington. Those buildings should be constructed with reference to and in subordination to a plan which should be promptly worked out for their construction. They should be built with reference not only to the fiscal needs of the Government but with reference to the symmetry and harmony and beauty of the city.

I am told that former committees of Congress, who have considered the plans and policies for the District of Columbia, have felt that there should be restrictions upon the height of buildings, though they were perhaps too dilatory in taking action in the matter. In 1910, however, they passed an act which fixed the height of buildings at 110 feet in the business part of the city. In the residential section of the city a different rule was adopted. As I am advised, the zoning commission adopted a maximum height of 110 feet for the business districts, although they had authority to lower but not to increase this limit.

Prior to the establishment of the zoning regulations the Munsey Building upon Pennsylvania Avenue and the Willard Hotel, facing the same avenue, were erected. The height of each of these buildings exceeded the limit fixed in the later statute. However, in front of the Munsey Building there is not only the Avenue but another street and a parkway, so that between the curb in front of the building and the curb to the south the distance is perhaps 300 feet. There might be justification for permitting a greater height where a building was constructed upon so wide a street and with an area as wide as that in front of the Munsey Building and also in front of the Willard Hotel.

Most of the business streets of Washington are rather narrow. F Street is 100 feet in width and Fourteenth Street, between the Willard Hotel and the site of the proposed Press Club Building is 110 feet. The Willard Hotel, facing F Street, is 138 feet high. The building opposite the proposed Press Club Building (the Westory Building) is 110 feet in height. I repeat, the law permits the zoning commission to grant permits for buildings to be erected to a height not to exceed 110 feet. I am told that this law received full consideration at the hands of Congress and was not enacted until the whole subject had been fully canvassed and the requirements of the District and the people of the District fully considered.

The view was that this was not to be a great commercial city, that there should be, so far as possible, a substantial uniform skyline and buildings constructed in conformity with architectural plans, to be approved by proper officials of the District of Columbia, including the Fine Arts Commission. It was hoped that the devastating activities in the city would cease and that the vandalism and destruction which were ruining the beauty of Washington might be halted, and that a new spirit would animate those who built and planned, so that a city beautiful might be erected which would meet the aspirations and the desires of the American people.

In my opinion, Congress acted wisely and the zoning commission has sought to carry out the law in good faith and according to its letter and spirit. I freely confess that in other cities a different plan might, with propriety, be adopted and the character of the city and the needs of the people and the nature of the enterprises and business and industries engaging the people, regarded.

I know there are many who do not see any objection to skyscrapers in the narrow streets of Washington, or irregular sky-lines or an entire lack of uniformity in streets, in business sections, and in the residential sections.

Mr. President, a person may be a shrewd business man and interested in business enterprises, and yet be deeply concerned in the symmetry and beauty and harmony of a city such as Washington. Some of the great business men of our country are profoundly interested in public buildings, in beautiful structures, in art, in museums, and in all things that make for the cultural and intellectual and spiritual development of the people. I am a good deal of a utilitarian and try to understand the business needs and requirements of our country and of our great cities. I have been able, however, to distinguish Washington from other cities and have taken the position that it was to be distinguished from the marts of trade and commerce and the industrial and business centers of the United States.

As I came into the Chamber a few moments ago, the Washington Post was handed to me and I noticed a very striking cartoon which shows the vandalism and destruction taking place in the suburbs of Washington. Beautiful trees and forests are being uprooted and torn asunder by the vicious and hungry bites of a mechanical dragon representing a steam shovel, and by this same monster, hills are being leveled and the surrounding beauties of Washington destroyed.

I am afraid that too many of us see the purely materialistic side of life and are imbued too much with the business and commercial spirit of the hour. It is quite likely, from what I can learn, that this bill will be passed. It has been widely advertised, and the importance of its passage has been emphasized and stressed. Reference has been made to the fact that it is a building erected by the Press Club, and I have been told that there should be no opposition to the wishes of the press.

Mr. President, no one has greater appreciation of the contributions which the newspapers of the United States have made and are making to liberty and to civilization than I have. The press is a mighty weapon in behalf of freedom and justice. No one, of course, living in a democratic country would deprecate the influence and power and the necessity of a vigorous and honest press. No one can deny the obligation which the American people are under to the newspaper men of our country. But members of the press are entitled to no greater rights than other citizens. And organizations in which they are interested are entitled to the same and no greater rights than are enjoyed by other organizations. Indeed, knowing hundreds of splendid, able, and patriotic newspaper men, and some of the proprietors of important newspapers and magazines throughout the country, I know that they desire no favors for themselves which they are unwilling shall be granted to others. Undoubtedly they believe that the construction of the National Press Club Building will be of benefit to the city and add to its beauty. They believe that the commissioners and the other officials to whom I have referred did not wisely exercise the discretion vested in them, or at least that they should have recommended a departure from the maximum limit of 130 feet. These views are shared by many Senators and doubtless by many people. I make no complaint, and accord to others the fullest liberty to advocate such measures and such policies as they deem proper. I am sure the newspaper men, with their well-known liberality of views, will have the same respect and regard for the views of those who differ from them as they do for those who are in harmony with them.

This question should be considered upon its merits, aside from those who are interested in the building or who are promoting the enterprise. If it is proper to pass this bill, it should be passed, and passed promptly. If not, it should be defeated. I have felt that I could not give my support to the bill, but have been desirous of having the Senate pass upon it at the earliest possible moment, so that those who are interested in the erection of the building might make their plans accordingly and not be halted in the work which they are about to undertake.

Colonel Bell, one of the Commissioners of the District, wrote me on the 3d instant concerning the pending measure and inclosed a copy of the letter from the chairman of the Fine Arts Commission relative to the same. Colonel Bell states:

I have discussed this matter informally with all the members of the zoning commission except Major Grant, who is out of the city to-day, and the zoning commission concurs in the recommendation of the board of commissioners.

I might say, Mr. President, that when we were having a hearing upon the District of Columbia appropriation bill Major Grant, in response to a question which was propounded to him by myself, stated that he approved of the regulations which have been adopted by the zoning commission and stood by their views with respect to the proposed building.

I have a copy of a letter here, which was sent to me by Colonel Bell, from Mr. Charles B. Moore, the chairman of the Commission of Fine Arts, which is dated March 26, 1926, and reads as follows:

DEAR MR. WEBSTER: The Commission of Fine Arts at their meeting on March 25 considered your letter of March 11 in regard to the height of the building under construction at Fourteenth and F Streets NW.

The commission are unanimously of the opinion that the zoning laws as established should be observed according to their letter and their spirit. No special legislation should be enacted to give one person or a group of persons rights that are not extended to all other persons similarly situated. If the building under construction is "to be erected to a height not to exceed 140 feet above the F Street curb," then all buildings along F Street should be allowed to be built to that height.

The plans as submitted to the commission provide for a setback. The Commission of Fine Arts regard setbacks as desirable when properly regulated. The regulation of them should be carefully considered and should be made to apply throughout the city.

That letter is signed by the chairman of the Fine Arts Commission. It will be observed, Mr. President, that the commission unanimously recommends that the zoning laws as established should be observed according to their letter and spirit.

I have here a copy of a letter which was transmitted by Mr. Cuno Rudolph, chairman of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia, to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER], chairman of the District Committee of the Senate. It is dated March 4, 1926, and in it the following language appears in part:

The Commissioners of the District of Columbia have the honor to submit the following on Senate bill 3190, Sixty-ninth Congress, first session, entitled "A bill to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate the height of buildings in the District of Columbia,' approved June 1, 1910," which was referred to them for report touching the merits of the bill and the propriety of its passage.

During the last session of Congress a bill—was enacted which permitted the Harrington Hotel to carry a new building to the height of 130 feet, although the height prescribed by the zoning regulations is 110 feet, the maximum for any property within the District of Columbia under the height prescribed by the zoning regulations. The height permitted at the location for the Harrington Hotel under the act of Congress approved June 1, 1910, was 130 feet, and the commissioners were of the opinion that that height should be permitted in that case, because the building proposed would then be the same height as the adjacent building, and the height not in excess of that prescribed by the act of Congress of June 1, 1910.

Giving the number of it—

The building adjoining it, as I am advised, was constructed prior to the zoning regulations and the passage of the law to which I have invited attention. Congress, some people think, made a mistake when it modified the 1910 act and permitted the Harrington Hotel to rise to a height of 130 feet and gave the commissioners and other officials the power to grant permission for future buildings to be erected to a height in excess of 110 feet. However, that bridge has been crossed, and the question is, Shall we further modify the law and raise the maximum to 140 feet?

Further reading from the letter:

The commissioners are of the opinion that their recommendation in the present instance should be consistent with their recommendation with respect to the Harrington Hotel case.

There are higher buildings adjacent to the proposed Press Club Building, namely, the Willard Hotel and the Munsey Building, and it is believed that a height of 130 feet, which would be consistent with the act of Congress of June 1, 1910, should be permitted. To comply with this requirement the word "forty" in line 1, on page 2, should be changed to "twenty."

Mr. President, the Senate is now advised as to the views of the commissioners, the Fine Arts Commission, and the zoning commission. Shall we follow their recommendations or shall we ignore them? As stated, I should be exceedingly gratified if I could support the bill. I have presented to the Senate what little I have to say upon this matter, and shall leave the question for their determination.

I might add one further statement. Already persons have been to see me, asking if they will be granted the same privilege as that provided in the pending bill. A representative of a corporation, which is to construct a building on New York Avenue, told me that if his company could obtain permission to construct a building to the height of 140 feet, it would immediately proceed upon the undertaking and erect a fine structure costing several millions of dollars.

Undoubtedly, if this bill passes, Congress will be importuned by others to modify the existing law and to pass special bills in their behalf. I submit to Senators, will it be wise? If the measure before us is enacted, where shall the line be drawn? There are amendments now pending to the bill under consideration to extend its provisions to the entire square upon which the Press Club Building is to be erected, as well as to other squares upon other streets in the city. We should consider the matter with the utmost care, with an eye single to the best interests of this Capital City, the inhabitants of the District of Columbia, and to the welfare of our country.

MR. COPELAND. Mr. President, I find myself in the fullest accord with practically everything the Senator from Utah has said. I know how devoted he is to the community, to the city, and to the District. I am in harmony with his ideas about beautifying the city, about maintaining restrictions which will insure for all time that it will be the model city of the country. In regard to this particular building and the block in which it is located, I took the view in the Committee on the District of Columbia that if we should change the restriction as regards this particular lot we should take the entire block and make a uniform height for that block.

However, there is ample justification for the request of the Press Club. The height of the Willard Hotel given by the Senator from Utah applies to its frontage on Pennsylvania Avenue. On F Street it is 158 feet high.

MR. KING. Mr. President, I beg the Senator's pardon. Major Wheeler, with whom I spoke this morning, said that on Pennsylvania Avenue the height of the Willard Hotel was substantially as the Senator said, and on F Street 138 feet. I think the Senator reversed it.

MR. COPELAND. That may be true; but, so far as the Munsey Building is concerned, which is in the same block, the elevation of that building is 156 feet and 8 inches.

MR. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me an interruption right there?

MR. COPELAND. Yes.

MR. KING. The Munsey Building, I think, is entirely too high. I think permission ought never to have been granted to erect it to its present height, but this much must be said with respect to it: It is on Pennsylvania Avenue, and there is a large vacant space, a large area in front of it, and I think from curb to curb the street must be—and I am only speaking now from my recollection of the situation—perhaps 150 or 200 feet.

MR. COPELAND. I think it is.

MR. KING. That would make a difference, and yet I do not plead that by way of justification for the height to which the Munsey Co. was permitted to erect its building.

MR. COPELAND. Mr. President, after hearing the testimony in the District Committee, it was my proposal that we make the height of buildings in that block 150 feet. I think the first bill which was brought in regarding the Press Club building allowed a height of 150 feet, but afterwards, finding out what was the height of other buildings, it seemed wise to accept the House bill and recommend a limit of 140 feet.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDWARDS] has offered an amendment, which I promised to call attention to and send forward to the desk, to make the height of all the buildings in that block 140 feet. In connection with that amendment, I have here and have promised to put into the RECORD a petition from the owners of property in that entire block asking that the height of buildings in the block be made 140 feet.

I ask unanimous consent to have this petition inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We, the undersigned property holders in square 254 of the District of Columbia, do respectfully petition the Senate for an amendment to H. R. 9398, which was passed by the House and is now on the Senate Calendar, by which all the property holders in the said square shall receive the same rights under the said bill as are to be bestowed on the National Press Building Corporation.

We respectfully represent that it is only a matter of fairness and right that if one-quarter of this square is to be exempted from the building limit of 110 feet that the other three-quarters of the square receive the same privilege.

Lots 28, 809, 810, 819, 37, 23, 44, 821, 801, 22, 46, 815, 45, 47, 824, 807, 808, 43, 805, 801, 811, 812, and 803.

Columbia Barber Co., George Miller, secretary; D. Loughran Co. (Inc.), J. W. Loughran, president; D. Loughran Estate, J. W. Loughran, agent; F. V. Killian; Anchor Theatrical Corporation (Inc.); Brownley Investment Co.; Rapley Theater Co., W. H. Rapley, president; C. C. Willard Estate, by Clare Willard, secretary; Henry A. Willard Estate, by J. M. Kirby, agent; Sarah B. Willard Estate, by J. M. Kirby, agent; the Munsey Trust Company, C. H. Pope, vice president; John J. Schwartz; C. Heinrich; Mary T. Milovich.

Mr. COPELAND. As regards the press building, the Senator from Utah and every other Senator realize that in recent years the overhead expense of every great building has increased so materially that the possibility of having one floor additional may make all the difference between success and failure in the operation of the plant. We are all agreed in the committee. The engineer commissioner was present and said that he could see no particular objection to placing the height of the building at 140 or even 150 feet. I think the zoning commission is entirely right in insisting upon the rule and that there should not be light reasons given for a change in the rule. I think the commission is entirely right in that; but in this instance, where the sky line now is far above 110 or even 130 feet, there is every reason in the world why this building should be permitted to be built to a height of 140 feet.

So I hope, Mr. President, that in spite of the logic and the argument and the good faith of the Senator from Utah the Senate will agree to the proposal and permit this building to be built to a height of 140 feet.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I am sorry that it is necessary for me to differ with the Senator from Utah in regard to this bill. It had full consideration by the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia, and the recommendation made by the committee was agreed to by every member of the committee except the Senator from Utah. A very representative delegation from the National Press Club was present and presented arguments in a very strong way for the enactment of the legislation. As the Senator from New York has said, the engineer commissioner was present and, while stating that the commission did not feel that it would indorse or recommend the passage of the bill, yet it had no objection to it.

Mr. Moore, of the Fine Arts Commission, was unable to be present, but he sent word that he felt that it would be better if all the buildings in that block might be of the same height, but he offered no objection to the passage of the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAPPER. I yield.

Mr. KING. I do not see how the Senator can make those statements in the face of these written statements by Mr. Moore and by Colonel Bell. Those men are guilty of duplicity and insincerity if they write this to me and to the commission and then make the statements which the Senator attributes to them. I want to say to the Senator that I talked with Major Wheeler only a day or two ago, and he said that the commission, the zoning commission and the Fine Arts Commission, adhered to the statements which I have read to the Senate this morning.

Mr. CAPPER. I only know what Commissioner Bell had to say at the meeting of the committee when a large number of people were present.

Mr. KING. Here is his letter to me, which I have read this morning.

Mr. CAPPER. As to Mr. Moore, his latest statement was made after he had gone into the matter further; and while he did not withdraw his objections, he said that the commission would have no objection to that height if it could be applied to the entire block. So I certainly hope that the bill as it comes from the House will be passed.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I am interested in the amendment to this bill which has just been read. Under that amendment a business concern desires to exercise the same privilege in the square between New York Avenue and G Street and Fifteenth Street that would be exercised by the Press Club under the provisions of the bill itself.

Personally, I am heartily in favor of the license desired by the Press Club being granted to it, not only because I think that there are reasons why it is peculiarly entitled to consideration as respects the height to which it proposes to erect its building, but for general reasons.

I differ absolutely from the Senator from Utah with respect to the expediency of imposing height limitations on buildings in the business section of Washington. While, of course, the views of the District Commissioners upon that subject are entitled to a high degree of respect, they are, as far as I am concerned, by no means binding or conclusive; and I, for one, have no objection, whenever a real occasion for doing it arises, to setting aside the general restrictions of the zoning law to which the Senator from Utah has referred, or any other building law applicable to the District.

It seems to me that the Senator from Utah is asserting his nice artistic scruples in the wrong place. He reminds me a little bit of the astronomer in Æsop's Fables, who was so busy scanning the skies that he tumbled over into a well.

Mr. KING. The Senator is scanning the skies. He wants a high building. I do not. I want to keep on the ground.

Mr. BRUCE. No; the Senator entered into all sorts of nice refinements. Of course, we all know that the Senator has the same tendency as the rest of us to go up into the air at times, and I do not wish to impose too harsh restrictions upon his ascents. I say, however, that it seems to me that he is placing the emphasis in the wrong place. What this town needs more than anything else is some plan under which the area or the areas in it that should be set aside for public purposes would not be invaded by residential or business buildings.

As respects the extension of public building construction in this city, it can be said with as much truth as it can be said with respect to anything, in the language of the Scriptures, that—

Where there is no vision, the people perish.

Fifty, sixty, seventy years ago, if as far back as that the pecuniary resources of the Government were equal to such an achievement, this Government should have acquired all the property on either side of Pennsylvania Avenue from the Treasury Department down to the National Capitol. Then, indeed, as time went on this great Capital of ours would have been distinguished by the noblest, the most impressive, the most beautiful group of public buildings in the whole wide world, more beautiful than anything that Paris can offer, more beautiful than anything that Vienna can offer, more beautiful than any collection of buildings in the world in the form of a city. But Washington is a city of lost artistic opportunities. Though the idea that I am now outlining has been repeatedly suggested, it never has been followed up as it should have been. Consequently the development of the public-building side of Washington has been allowed to proceed in a hopelessly desultory, haphazard, and random sort of way.

The Government has bought land and erected public buildings here and there on it without reference to any comprehensive plan of any kind, building the Pension Building here, erecting or purchasing a building for the Department of Commerce there, both north of Pennsylvania Avenue, and erecting other scattered public buildings in other places, and even buying old buildings and reconstructing them for public purposes. In an artistic sense, all or much of that expenditure of money is absolutely lost, as much as if it were engulfed in the waters of the Pacific or the Atlantic. The same mistake, because of the same lack of vision, foresight, and expert skill, is now about to be repeated in the public buildings bill which we will have under consideration in a day or so at the most. There, again, Congress is asked to appropriate $50,000,000 for the purchase of sites for public buildings and for the erection and reconstruction and purchase of public buildings in the city of Washington. The geographical limits within which that money is to be expended are not defined in the bill. Buildings may be erected or purchased north of Pennsylvania Avenue or south of Pennsylvania Avenue; sites may be purchased north of Pennsylvania Avenue or south of Pennsylvania Avenue; existing public buildings may be reconstructed north of Pennsylvania Avenue or south of Pennsylvania Avenue. The bill, to use the language of the poet, is "a mighty maze without a plan"; and the very gall in one of my physical organs begins to diffuse itself through my frame when I read the declaration in that bill that all public buildings erected under the bill are to be standardized, as if they were to be so many dry goods boxes on a colossal scale.

I propose to touch on those matters later. Let the Government, I say, make up its mind, under competent direction, as to how the plan of public building construction in this city is to unfold, and then let it adhere to that plan. When it makes up its mind I assume that it will make it up under the very best professional advice.

If the resources of the Government are not equal at present to the purchase of all property of every description on either side of Pennsylvania Avenue from the Treasury Department down to the Capitol, it should at least take initial steps for the final acquisition of the last remnant of that property, much of which it owns already. And when some enlightened public building plan has been adopted by the Government, then I should share the scruples, perhaps I might call them the aerial scruples, of the Senator from Utah. I would not allow any business or residential structure to be built upon that avenue or near enough to it to mar its beauty as improved for public purposes.

So with the residential sections of the city. Of course, there should be a proper zoning law shutting out business buildings of one sort or another from those sections. In other words, I would have a great area for the erection of public buildings. I would have other great areas for residential purposes, and then I would have areas for business purposes, because the people of Washington are entitled to have their private business provided for in every respect. Within those business areas I would not impose any limitation upon the height of buildings whatsoever.

What right has the Senator from Utah to say that the material interests of the people of this city should be sacrificed to the fact that Washington happens to be the National Capital? In doing that, he reminds me of a Japanese trying to tie an oak down to the dimensions of a flower pot. This city has put on a pair of seven-league boots. It is growing with most remarkable rapidity. I have had occasion, as a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, to go out to its suburbs and everywhere are evidences of growth, of expansion, of extension. The fact is that the business interests of this town are assuming no small degree of importance. Its retail-store interests, of course, are of very great importance; and I understand that to some extent industries are beginning to spring up within or just outside the limits of the city. Why should any artificial clogs of any kind be imposed upon the business progress of Washington in localities where business can properly be allowed to spring up; that is to say, consistently with what is due to the public-building area or areas of Washington and its residential area or areas?

So, naturally enough, entertaining these general views, I think that this privilege ought to be accorded to the Press Club. What harm will it do to anybody? They are about to erect a splendid building, which will be one of the architectural ornaments of Washington. Certainly I do not know any influence in American public life that is better entitled to a local habitation and a name than the American press. It was only a night or so ago that I heard a speaker repeat that pithy observation of Thomas Jefferson, that if he had to take his choice between government without newspapers and newspapers without government he would choose the latter; and so would I, because without newspapers there is no such thing as intelligent and incorrupt government.

So let the gentlemen of the press have their building. Let it rise into the air as high as they may desire, indeed, to as lofty a height as the aspirations of a free press itself rise. Then let these enterprising people for whose benefit my amendment has been offered have their building, too, with a height of 140 feet above the G Street curb. It, as I have said, would be in the block between New York Avenue and G Street, on Fifteenth Street. What harm would it do to anybody to have that building ascend to a height of 140 feet above the G Street curb? If it interfered in anyway whatever with the public building ideas that I have suggested, I should oppose it, and oppose it with all the power that lies in me, because I would not willingly see any structure of any kind, residential or business, erected at any place, which would interfere with the orderly evolution of the public building growth of Washington.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BRUCE. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I concur, in a general way, with the observations of the Senator from Maryland. I think that he is absolutely right with respect to the business section of the city. I am inclined to think he is right in respect to the other sections of the city. But I wanted to ask the Senator this question. Aside from his general proposition, does he not think that at this particular location there is a difference in favor of his proposition from the situation in some other sections of the city? Just across the street, as we all know, and as has been referred to in the discussion, is the Willard Hotel. It fronts both upon F Street and upon Fourteenth Street. The proposed building will front upon F Street and upon Fourteenth Street; on the other side of Fourteenth Street. The Willard Hotel is 138 feet high, as I understand it.

Mr. BRUCE. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Press Club Building is limited to 130 feet, and according to my conception that will mar both the sightliness and the symmetry at that point. If the Press Club is allowed to build to the height of the Willard or, indeed, higher—

Mr. BRUCE. Two feet higher is the proposition.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will that not better conserve symmetry at that point than if it should be limited to 130 feet?

Mr. BRUCE. As I look at the matter, the preservation of symmetry as respects the height of buildings in business sections of a city is a matter of no material importance whatsoever.

Mr. SIMMONS. That I have conceded; but if the contrary view shall obtain as to the city at large, at that particular point would not the symmetry be better preserved by allowing this new building to be 140 feet than by limiting it to 130 feet by reason of the fact that on the opposite corner the building is 138 feet high?

Mr. BRUCE. I agree entirely with the Senator, and I confess that that aspect of the matter has escaped my observation. I thank the Senator for saying what he has said. In other words, a height of 140 feet, the Senator from New York will understand, promotes a degree of symmetry that a height of only 130 feet would impair. So if there is to be any consideration of the elevation of these two buildings at all—the building mentioned in the bill proper and the building mentioned in the amendment—it is better, so far as symmetry is concerned, that the height of the buildings should be 140 feet rather than 130 feet. The difference would be so trifling it would be hardly visible to the eye.

Mr. SIMMONS. In the other instance it would be quite marked.

Mr. BRUCE. Yes; it is, as far as lineal measurement goes, but so far as visualization goes the matter would be one of very little importance.

As I have intimated, for the purpose of my argument it is not necessary to stop there. I do not want to see any unreasonable limitation imposed upon the business growth of Washington. There is no reason why this city should not have its large business interests.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator whether he recalls the height of the building on the northwest corner of Fourteenth and F? I think it is a pretty tall building.

Mr. KING. That is 110 feet high.

Mr. BRUCE. The Munsey Building is about 158 feet high.

Mr. FLETCHER. What is the height of the building just south of this building on Fourteenth Street, occupied by the Bureau of Public Roads?

Mr. KING. It is less than 100 feet high.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator from Florida brought out another highly relevant fact in connection with the discussion; that is to say, that on Fourteenth Street, at the point to which he referred, there is that marked irregularity.

In conclusion I want to say that my friend, the Senator from Utah, knows that I was indulging in a little awkward playfulness when I spoke of him as going up in the air. According to my political connections and limited stock of political ideas, I know of no Member of this body who is more in the habit of keeping his feet on the earth than is the Senator from Utah. If that were not true, I could not afford to say it because usually my feet are planted right where his are planted. If he ever gets up into the air, it is perhaps because it is congenial with his nature to breathe an ether that is just a little more wholesome than the air nearer to the earth. I say that much because my relations with the Senator from Utah and my respect for him are such that I could not afford for one single moment to have him form any misconception as to anything that I might say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIAMS in the chair). The pending amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment offered by the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDWARDS] proposes to strike out lines 7 to 11, inclusive, in the following words:

And provided further, That the building to be erected in lots 813, 814, and 820 in square 254, located on the southeast corner of Fourteenth and F Streets NW., be permitted to be erected to a height not to exceed 140 feet above the F Street curb.

And to insert the following language:

And provided further, That buildings to be erected in square 254, bounded by Fourteenth Street, F Street, Thirteenth Street, and E Street NW., be permitted to be erected to a height not to exceed 140 feet above the F Street curb.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if it had not been for the concluding statement of the Senator from Maryland I should have been inclined to draw the sword and endeavor to give him as good as he gave me.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator is perfectly capable of doing it. Mr. KING. The Senator's speech reminded me of a title to a book written in the thirteenth century. Before giving the title I shall briefly refer to the scope of ground and circumambient atmosphere covered and penetrated by my friend from Maryland. He spoke about the Bible and the necessity of vision in Aesop's Fables, the Japanese flower pot and the oak, the failure of Congress to adopt and follow a harmonious plan for the development of Washington. He exhibited greater familiarity with aerial matters than I possess and seemed willing to soar into the skies or at least to build into the nether blue. He wanted buildings to pierce the clouds, and I thought he would quote Webster's eloquent words when he referred to the monument that was to rise and pierce the skies. The Senator is always illuminating, and because of his erudition he is always instructive, but I could not help thinking, as he was dealing with me for the feeble words which I had uttered, of the title to the book which I have just referred to. The author said that it was "A book concerning all things and certain other things also." The speech of the Senator from Maryland concerns all things and certain other things also. But I am disarmed by his closing statement, and if permitted I would drink, of course, in water, to his health and would wish that he might live long and prosper.

My good friend was a little inconsistent, because being a Democrat, he does not believe in special privileges; and yet his chief reason for supporting the bill was that the Press Club deserves "special privileges" or special consideration. I paid my tribute to the press, but the members of the press are honorable men and they do not want special privileges. Any man who thinks—and, of course, the Senator had not that in mind at all, and I am speaking impersonally—that he makes friends of honorable journalists by any offer of sycophancy makes a mistake.

Mr. President, the speech of the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] was a sensible one. He kept his feet upon the ground. He approved substantially all that I have said, that we should have a city here that is symmetrical and conformable to certain architectural types and lines. I hope my good friend from Maryland, whom I love, did not deduce from anything I said that I was opposed to business. Paris has today more than two and one-half millions of people. It has one hundred times, perhaps, as much business as the city of Washington. But its business houses, great as they are, conform to certain lines of architectural types which have been prescribed years ago. I presume the Senate and the House understood what they were doing when they laid down a rule of 110 feet and gave to the zoning commission authority to restrict it below that limit. Are we so much wiser? Perhaps some of us are, but not the Senator from Utah. I think they laid down that plan after full investigation. They were seeking to conform the development of the city to certain rules and regulations for which my good friend is contending.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. When was the law restricting the height to 110 feet enacted?

Mr. KING. In 1910.

Mr. HARRISON. There has been no change so far as the law is concerned?

Mr. KING. Not in the general law; but there was a deviation from it when a special act was passed permitting the erection of the Harrington Hotel, the limit being fixed at 130 feet. I have heretofore stated the reason given for this action.

Mr. HARRISON. What was the height limit before 1910?

Mr. KING. I am not sure what the regulation was.

Mr. HARRISON. It is quite true that through the years and during the growth of the city they have gradually increased the height of buildings in the business section of the city, is it not?

Mr. KING. I do not think that is quite accurate, and yet if the Senator knows, I would not dispute it.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know; I am merely asking for information.

Mr. McKELLAR. What is the height requested here?

Mr. KING. It is 140 feet.

Mr. McKELLAR. What was the limitation on the height of the Munsey Building?

Mr. KING. The Munsey Building was built having in mind the great width of the street with a large area and two streets in front of it. As Major Wheeler, of the zoning commission, told me this morning, the present law enacted June 1, 1910, fixed the maximum height of buildings at 110 feet, the commission having discretion to limit the height below that figure.

Mr. McKELLAR. What is the height of the Willard Hotel right across the street?

Mr. KING. That is 138 feet.

Mr. BRUCE. The Munsey Building is 156 feet and 8 inches in height.

Mr. KING. But the Senator knows that the Munsey Building, as I have stated several times, faces upon a very wide area, which is perhaps 150 or 200 feet in width.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is down grade from F Street, too.

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. What is the Senator's idea about it? What is the height to which he believes the building should be restricted?

Mr. KING. I would leave the matter entirely with the constituted authorities; that is to say, the Commissioners of the District, the zoning commission, and the Fine Arts Commission. When Congress sets up agencies to discharge certain duties and exercise their discretion, I would follow them, unless some special condition in some contingency arose which called for a modification of the law.

These officials are favorable to a limit of 130 feet. Accordingly, I would support that recommendation. We have invested them with authority and I would leave the matter in their hands. The District Commissioners and the Fine Arts Commission and the zoning commission have recommended against the bill; but, as stated, I am willing to recommend the maximum limit allowed by law, 130 feet.

Mr. McKELLAR. How was the vote of the committee?

Mr. KING. I was not present. I am told that all the members of the committee who were present favored the bill. Senator SACKETT and myself were not present.

Mr. COPELAND. May I answer the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. KING. Certainly.

Mr. COPELAND. The vote in the committee was for a height of 150 feet, and every member of the committee except the junior Senator from Utah voted for that height. However, the House passed a bill providing for a height of 140 feet, and therefore it seemed wise for us to recede and accept the suggestion of the House.

Mr. KING. May I say to the Senator from New York and to the Senator from Maryland, if I understand the purpose or the plan of the building that it will bring the building, as one descends toward Pennsylvania Avenue, to a greater height above the curb than 140 feet, because the descent, as Senators will recall, is quite rapid; so I would imagine the extreme southern end of the building on Fourteenth Street would attain a height of approximately 148 or 150 feet.

Mr. BRUCE. I do not know. I am not certain about that fact.

Mr. HARRISON. But at that point the building would then be lower than the Willard Hotel. As one goes toward Pennsylvania Avenue on Fourteenth Street the lower end of the Press Club Building would be much lower than the height of the Willard Hotel.

Mr. KING. I think it would be from 4 to 6 feet, or approximately a little more, below the height of the Willard Hotel as it fronts on Pennsylvania Avenue.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President, as I understand it now, the Press Club Building, if 140 feet high, will still be below the sky line of the Munsey Building. Is that true?

Mr. CAPPER. That is true. If the Senator will yield to me for a moment, I will make a brief statement concerning that.

Mr. KING. Certainly.

Mr. CAPPER. Here is a statement filed with the committee by the Press Club committee having in charge the building, in which they said:

The only objection that the Press Club has heard of has come from the Munsey estate, which now controls the Munsey Building, and this objection the Press Club is now informed was made through error in that it was assumed that the Press Club Building would reach a much higher level than the Munsey Building, rather than the actual fact, which is that the Press Club Building erected to the full height requested in this bill would be lower than the Munsey Building.

The Willard Hotel will also be considerably higher than the press building when completed, and there can be no question at all but that these three buildings, approximately the same height, will give a much better sky line and more greatly enhance the beauty of the city than if this colossal press building were forced to be erected to a lower level and less symmetrical mass.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President, that statement may be true in so far as these three buildings are concerned, but will not every business house on F Street be immediately asking for permission to erect another story or two stories on top of its building when this bill shall have been passed?

Mr. KING. An amendment has been offered, extending the provisions of the bill to the entire block.

Mr. HARRELD. How did we ever depart from 110 feet as the height under the zoning law to 140 feet? How did the Munsey Building ever come to be built? How did the Hotel Willard ever come to be built at that height?

Mr. CAPPER. Both those buildings were erected before the enactment of the zoning law.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit there, there is a kind of elastic provision. Under certain circumstances the zoning commission may permit a height of 130 feet; but they never, by their own act, are permitted to go beyond 130 feet. When it is proposed that the height of a building shall go beyond that, the question must come to Congress. That is the reason why the Press Club have appealed to Congress. They found that in financing this project they must add another story to their building in order to carry them over.

Mr. HARRELD. I do not think that is a consideration. I have the highest regard in the world for the Press Club, but they ought not to want and they ought not to ask any special favors. I would deal with them just like I would with any individual in this matter.

Mr. COPELAND. When the matter was before the committee the very thought which the Senator from Oklahoma has in mind was raised. The question was, Why should an exception be made in favor of the Press Club?

Mr. HARRELD. I should like to know why.

Mr. COPELAND. At that time I think I myself offered the motion to make the height for the whole block 150 feet.

Mr. HARRELD. Then you would have to let owners of property on every other block in that vicinity erect buildings to the same height.

Mr. KING. And it would be insisted that Congress should allow buildings to be erected to the same height on the other side of the street.

Mr. COPELAND. The objection to that was that Major Bell, who was representing the commissioners and the zoning commission, said that they preferred that the committee would not take action about anything except this particular building, because they preferred to have each case considered on its merits. Furthermore, there was to be, as I understand, a restudy of the question of zoning.

The Senator from Oklahoma and, I am sure, the Senator from Utah appreciate this point: The question of overhead in a great building to-day is very different from what it was before the World War.

Mr. HARRELD. Granting that is true, are these people to have a special privilege over the other property owners in the vicinity? Is that what the Senator is arguing for?

Mr. COPELAND. I am arguing that the Press Club, having come to us to present their cause, and having granted such permission in other cases by action of Congress, we should grant permission in this instance. Not, however, because it is the Press Club, for if the Senator from Oklahoma will present a bill to have the height of a building raised on some particular lot, I know Congress will be very glad to consider it.

Mr. HARRELD. If I owned the building on the corner across the street from the proposed building, I will tell the Senator, I would next day ask for the same privilege. The question is, Are we going to accord the same privilege to everybody, or are we merely going to let one person or one individual or one club have this privilege? I have the highest regard in the world for the Press Club, but they ought not to ask for anything we are not willing to give other people. It is beyond and above them. I do not believe they should be charged with anything of that sort or even with requesting any special consideration in such a matter. I think too much of them to believe that they would do it.

Mr. CAPPER. Let me say to the Senator from Oklahoma that others have asked of Congress, and Congress has granted a similar privilege. The Harrington Hotel is an instance of that.

Mr. KING. That building was permitted to be erected to a height of 130 feet only for the reason that there was a building alongside of it of that height which had been erected the year before restrictions as to height had been adopted.

Mr. CAPPER. The height of that building exceeded the zoning restriction, and it required an act of Congress to enable the building to reach that height.

Mr. KING. Exactly; but that permission was granted only because there was a building there which had been erected before there were zoning restrictions or any law on the subject covered the situation. Of course, if an exception is made, it will be difficult to deny the benefits of the exception to all other persons.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me?

Mr. KING. I yield the floor.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President, I myself am interested in an office building and I know that it is very desirable to build into the sky because the overhead expenses, elevator service, and things of that sort on a 5-story building are practically the same as those on a 15-story building. Every owner of property in the vicinity of this building, should we grant this permission, will want to increase the height of his building to the extent to which the foundations will stand. The next day after the rule shall be varied such applications will be made. I know what I am talking about, because if the owners can add two or three stories to the top of their buildings it is practically net rent to them. Their overhead is going on anyway, and it is very desirable from their standpoint that they should be allowed to build additional stories. So we shall have a dozen applications the next day after we grant this permission.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I should judge from the remarks of the Senator from Oklahoma that the higher a building is the lower the overhead expense will be, and therefore that the rooms in a tall building could be rented cheaper than they could in a low building. Is that true?

Mr. HARRELD. That does not necessarily follow, because the rentals are usually fixed by all the buildings taken together, which include low buildings as well as high buildings.

Mr. PITTMAN. I have never had any interest in an office building, but I assume that when the overhead can be reduced the rentals also can be reduced.

Mr. HARRELD. It does not work that way, though, because the general average cost or rental of a room is made up of the demand for rooms in both low and high buildings, and it usually strikes an average; but it is a known fact among building owners that when 4 stories are exceeded elevator service must be installed, and when elevator service is put in the overhead becomes so great that the building will not pay unless it is run up to 10 stories. The higher the building goes above that the more money can be made out of it. That is a known fact.

Mr. PITTMAN. This also figures in it, that if an individual owns a lot that is worth a high price a square foot he can hardly afford to build a 3-story building on it.

Mr. HARRELD. That is true.

Mr. PITTMAN. And if the lot is as costly as the building, the whole cost of the operation is reduced by increasing the cubic renting space on that lot.

Mr. HARRELD. That is true.

Mr. PITTMAN. Of course, Washington has been considered a small city in the past, but we have watched the growth of large cities like New York and others where it became an absolute necessity to erect high buildings.

Mr. HARRELD. But, if the Senator will yield, if he will go to Paris or London, he will find that it has not become necessary there to go more than five stories high.

Mr. PITTMAN. But none of us want to go to Paris or London; none of us want to copy their business methods.

Mr. HARRELD. They are larger than Washington, although of course they are not larger than New York.

Mr. PITTMAN. I understand that; but of course they have imported a number of our architects in London, I am glad to say, and they are now planning skyscraper hotels in London.

Mr. HARRELD. I do not want the Senator to misunderstand me. I am not opposed to buildings going higher, but the same rule must apply to all. If we give the Press Club the right to go 140 feet, I am going to support every other request that comes here to make the same height apply to other buildings. That is all I have to say about it. It is not fair to give consideration to one and not to others. So, if we shall pass this bill, instead of having a 110-foot zoning law, we will have a 140-foot zoning law. That will be the effect of the passage of this bill.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, every application that has come before Congress of this nature has been granted.

Mr. HARRELD. But there never was one before that requested a height of 140 feet.

Mr. CAPPER. There was one for 130 feet. That was all that was asked.

Mr. HARRELD. Exactly. So there has been established a zoning law allowing a height of 130 feet, and the pending bill proposes to raise that limit, and, immediately we allow that to be done, we have reestablished a new zoning law, which provides for a height of 140 feet for buildings, because, as I have said, I am going to support everybody who applies for permission to erect a building to that height hereafter, and I think every other Senator will, for we can not afford not to do it. So the question is whether we want to raise the height prescribed by the zoning law from 110 feet to 140 feet. That is the question involved here.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I wish to say I will vote with the Senator from Oklahoma on that proposition. As buildings are being erected now with a different kind of top than the old blunt, square top, I think the skyscraper is a beautiful building. When the Senator from Oklahoma gets ready to make his motion, I will be very glad to support it.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President, I do not want to say that I would want to do that to the extent of destroying the beauty of the city. There must be a limit somewhere.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I have never been the owner of an office building. I have always been a renter, having been a practicing attorney for a number of years, and I am more interested in reducing rentals than I am in increasing profits. I know as a matter of economic fact that where there are high-priced lots the owner is enabled to reduce the rent by securing a greater renting space on such lots.

So far as the 140-foot limit is concerned, we have the Willard Hotel, which is not a high building by comparison with the buildings of this day. I should like to see the streets near the business center of Washington have a limit of not less than 140 feet.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate long. I was a little surprised to find my good friend from Oklahoma fighting the onward progress of the city of Washington and asserting that he was not in favor of this measure. I am surprised that the Senator, who comes from the great State of Oklahoma that boasts of at least two cities, Tulsa and Oklahoma City, in which in the past he has taken great pride, with their 50 and 75 story buildings—

Mr. HARRELD. The highest buildings there are 22 stories.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is too modest; more so than usual, when picturing the progress of the magic cities of Oklahoma. Of course I added a few dozen stories to the skyscrapers of Tulsa and Oklahoma City, but the Senator should take no offense at that, as it is but in keeping with the generous expressions of the Senator's constituents when thinking and talking of Oklahoma.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. HARRELD. The cities to which the Senator has referred are commercial cities, while Washington is a beautiful city which we are building as the capital of this the greatest country in the world and which is supposed to be free from commercialism.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator will find out after a while that the hands of progress move on and can not be stopped. Values have increased in Washington the same as they have in many of the other large cities. People can not buy property on F Street and other high-priced centers here at prevailing high prices and erect buildings thereon if they are going to be compelled to maintain them squatty, as they have in the past. They will not invest under such circumstances, the buildings will not be erected, and the progress and development of the city will be retarded.

Mr. President, I sympathize in practically all instances with the people of Washington. They have very broad aspirations, and they are not represented here, save as to such time as Senators and Representatives can give them from their other duties. While I sympathize with them in many of their aspirations, I can not but help sometimes to be aggrieved because of their silence and apparently lack of interest in so many matters which, it would seem to me, should appeal to them.

We talk about zoning commissions and the Fine Arts Commission and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia trying to beautify the city, trying to make it attractive to the people of the country, so that they will move here and live, and doing the best they can to maintain values. It is contended that in a particular block a building shall not be erected over 10 stories or beyond a certain height; it is contended that a business house shall not be located in certain blocks or along certain streets; and yet we have seen in this city, without any protest upon the part of the people or business organizations, and with apparent approbation of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and other leading men and women, values in certain sections forced down because they did not have the courage—I will not say the foresight, for everybody knows it would have been the wise thing to have done—to try to check the colored population of the city from moving surely and rapidly into white sections.

I say that with no desire to engage in any discussion over the race question; but there is not a Senator present, there is not a person in the city of Washington, there is not an employee of the Washington Post, the Star, the Times, the Herald, or the News, but knows that the usurpation of white sections by the colored people is destroying values and shifting residential sections. New Jersey Avenue was once a residential section for white people. Its values were high, its location attractive; but now look at it.

Colored people moved in and on it; the white people sacrificed and bought elsewhere. As the white people moved farther west and farther north the colored population one by one followed, and in proportion to the numbers that did follow values declined. This situation continued until the colored residents forced themselves as far as Fourteenth Street. Some thought that surely the movement would then stop. But no; ambitious ones of the lot dreamed of blocks beyond, and so the favored and prominent and socially inclined among them bought up to Sixteenth Street. At every step values went down. And so to-day it matters not where you may select to build your home or live, it will be but a short time when the stability of prices will be shattered and the property value declined on the invasion of the colored population. There must be some consideration given to this question. Poor people, aye, even widows, who possess perhaps nothing but a home have experienced their life savings sacrificed because some of the colored population bought and moved next door to them. Restricted areas for whites and colored make for the stability of values and the common contentment of both. Any other policy, such as we have experienced in Washington, breeds differences between the races and makes not only for the insecurity and instability of property values but estrangements and bad feeling. Why the business people and the residents of the District remain silent I can not understand. On the other hand, they indorse for high office men of the colored race who are the prime movers in that invasion, men who appear as lawyers in cases in the Supreme Court of the United States to test the validity of restrictive ordinances. So I say that sometimes I can not but feel aggrieved at the lack of interest upon the part of the District population in rendering some assistance to cure the evil.

I have said all I desire, perhaps more than I should have said. But it is out of my system, and I shall at least feel better from it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDWARDS].

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I hope the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey will not prevail. Recently we passed a bill creating a new commission for the purpose of preparing a plan for the city of Washington. I sympathize with what the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE] said about the necessity of providing a comprehensive plan to meet the needs of the District. About a year ago I introduced a bill authorizing the President to appoint a commission of three persons selected from among the most eminent architects, city planners, and builders in the United States for the purpose of preparing a plan for the future development of Washington, taking into account the streets, sanitation, public buildings, parks, highways, and every matter and thing relating to municipal government and to the welfare and development of the city. That bill in part has found a place in the measure which recently passed the Senate. I hope within a short time the organization created by this act will enter actively upon its duties. The organization as authorized to employ, as I recall, leading architects, builders, and city planners to aid in preparing a suitable plan to meet the necessities of the Nation's Capital. This amendment will, in my opinion, defeat the pending bill. So the friends of the measure before us should vote against it. There is no necessity of passing it now. Let us wait until the report of this new commission is presented.

When we meet in December we will perhaps have a report from them, or certainly within a few months thereafter, and the views of Senators may undergo a change with respect to building restrictions and cognate matters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDWARDS].

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, the Senator from New Jersey is not present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment was presented by the Senator from New York for the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. COPELAND. I offered the amendment at the request of the Senator from New Jersey, who could not be here to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment has been regularly submitted.

Mr. BLEASE. Was not the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey offered by him some days ago?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes; the amendment was pending when the bill came up this morning.

Mr. BLEASE. I suggest the absence of a quorum. A large number of Senators are absent from the Chamber.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, does the Senator feel that he desires to make that suggestion in view of the absence of the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. BLEASE. Yes; I do not think we ought to vote on a Senator's amendment without giving him a chance to get to the Chamber. That is why I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator from New Jersey is out of the city. He is not here. That was the reason why I presented the amendment in his absence; so I hope the Senator from South Carolina will not feel it necessary to call for a quorum.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, my recollection is that the amendment was offered the other day by the Senator from New Jersey himself.

Mr. COPELAND. It was.

Mr. BLEASE. I was in the chair at the time, and the Senator from New Jersey sent it up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is true that the amendment was offered by the Senator from New Jersey and it was pending this morning when the bill came up.

Mr. BLEASE. That is what I say. Then I think the Senator from New Jersey should have an opportunity to be in the Chamber when it is acted upon.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the Senator from New Jersey has authorized me to represent him to-day.

Mr. BLEASE. That is all right, then. If the Senator from New York had a talk with him, it is all right.

Mr. COPELAND. Yes; I have had.

Mr. BLEASE. Very well. I withdraw the suggestion of the absence of a quorum.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from New York whether the amendment offered on behalf of the Senator from New Jersey includes the squares in which I am interested? I do not suppose it does.

Mr. COPELAND. No, sir; it includes only the square in which the Press Club Building and the Munsey Building are situated. It does not include any others.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDWARDS]. The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. BRUCE. I believe my amendment comes next.

Mr. McKELLAR. May the amendment of the Senator from Maryland be stated?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Maryland will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Maryland offers the following amendment:

On page 1, line 11, after the words "F Street curb," insert the following:

"And provided further, That building to be erected on land in square 223, lots 8, 11, 10, 10, B, A, 802, 11, G, F, E, and D be permitted to be erected to a height not to exceed 140 feet above the G Street curb."

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I note the absence of a quorum.

Mr. COPELAND. I hope the Senator will not do that.

Mr. BRUCE. The first amendment that was offered, which asked for the same relief that my amendment asks for, was defeated, and I imagine that the same fate will overtake my amendment if it is left to this body without any real consideration. A great many Members of the Senate who were present when I made my observations on the pending bill are no longer present in the Senate Chamber.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRUCE. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. Personally, I am in favor of the Senator's amendment. It differs, however, from the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey in that it has not been considered by the District Committee. The amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey had been considered there. It had received the approval of the committee. Here we have a committee whose business it is to deal with these matters; and my judgment is, if I may say so to the Senator from Maryland, that this is a matter which should be considered by the committee before it is presented to the Senate.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I do not see that what the Senator from New York has said has any real pertinency to this amendment, because, of course, my argument was an entirely ineffectual one if I did not succeed in establishing certain general principles on which each and every one of these cases should turn. It does seem to me that the Senator is being influenced to some little extent by motives of selfish exclusion when he makes the point that he now makes with regard to the amendment offered by me. That is to say, having offered his own bill, and having quite ineffectively represented the Senator from New Jersey in relation to his amendment—quite languidly, I should say—he now announces, thinking that he is safely past the fiery ordeal himself, that he is opposed to the amendment offered by me.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield—

Mr. BRUCE. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. I did not say that I was opposed to the Senator's amendment. I think I said that I shall vote for his amendment, because I am in favor of increasing the height of all these buildings. What I did say related to the fact that this bill has not been considered by the District Committee.

Mr. BRUCE. To use the image of Alexander Pope, that is but another way of hinting dislike—not a body blow, of course, but a lateral stroke, like that of the man in the Bible who said:

Is it well with thee, my brother?

And then smote him under the fifth rib. I say that if this bill goes through the amendment should be adopted. There is no possible reason why any line of invidious discrimination should be drawn between this bill and this amendment—none whatever. There is no reason why the height of business structures should be limited where the Press Club building stands. There is no reason why it should be limited at this point between New York Avenue and G Street on Fifteenth Street.

I do not want to weary the Senate by chewing over the cud of a past discussion; that is certain; but many of the Senators who were present when I was making my address are no longer in the Senate Chamber, and I flatter myself that what I said must have had some little effect on the minds of some of the Members of the Senate; so I note the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERMAN in the chair). The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fess	Lenroot	Sheppard
Bayard	Fletcher	McKellar	Shipstead
Bingham	Frasler	McKinley	Shortridge
Bleuse	George	McMaster	Simmons
Borah	Gerry	McNary	Smith
Broussard	Gillett	Mayfield	Smoot
Bruce	Glass	Metcalf	Stanfield
Cameron	Goff	Moses	Stephens
Capper	Gooding	Neely	Swanson
Caraway	Harreld	Norbeck	Trammell
Copeland	Harris	Nye	Tyson
Couzens	Harrison	Oddie	Walsh
Curtis	Heflin	Overman	Warren
Dale	Howell	Phipps	Watson
Deneen	Johnson	Pine	Weller
Edge	Jones, N. Mex.	Pittman	Wheeler
Ernst	Jones, Wash.	Ransdell	Willis
Fernald	Kendrick	Reed, Pa.
Ferris	King	Sackett

Mr. PHIPPS. My colleague [Mr. MEANS] is absent on account of illness. I ask that this notice stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE].

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, when I addressed myself to my amendment to this bill a short time ago there was quite a full attendance of the Senate and, of course, it is sickening to me to think that I will have to cover the same ground in a second series of observations in the amendment.

Briefly, the situation is this: The pending bill provides that "the building to be erected on lots 813, 814, and 820 in square 254, located on the southeast corner of Fourteenth and F Streets NW., be permitted to be erected to a height not to exceed 140 feet above the F Street curb." That is the bill. My amendment asks that exactly the same privilege be allowed the corporation which proposes to erect the building on Fifteenth Street between New York Avenue and G Street. Just how any line of unjust discrimination can be properly drawn between the license requested by the bill and the license requested by the amendment, I for one can not see.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. BRUCE. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. I may be mistaken about it, but has not New York Avenue been widened lately?

Mr. BRUCE. Perhaps it has.

Mr. HARRISON. What is the width of New York Avenue?

Mr. BRUCE. I could not tell; but, of course, that corner is one that is very well known.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand that one of the arguments made a while ago in connection with fixing the height of buildings was that they should be equal to the width of the street plus 20 feet. New York Avenue, on which this building is to be located, is a very wide street. It may be 150 feet wide.

Mr. BRUCE. I thank the Senator for that point. The width of the street would justify a height of considerably more than 140 feet. That is the standard prescribed by the District Commissioners, and I can not for the life of me see why fish should be made of this bill and fowl of my amendment.

Mr. CAPPER. Does not the Senator think the better way to handle this building would be by way of a separate bill, as others have been handled?

Mr. BRUCE. No.

Mr. CAPPER. This Press Club bill is not the first bill that has come before the Senate when this privilege was sought.

Mr. BRUCE. That may be, but it is the first one brought to my attention after I was requested to offer this amendment. Of course, I know there are all sorts of influences at work here to prevent the adoption of this amendment, all kinds of influences elicited on account of the fact that certain individuals who are interested in that Press Club Building do not want their bill to go back to the House with any amendment on it. Here the bill is, and I have just the same right that any Senator has under similar circumstances to make this bill a host for my amendment. I want to know whether it is going out to the country that the Press Club, composed of representatives of the press, can come to Congress and get a privilege, and another body of citizens, who do not happen to be invested with exactly the same measure of influence and power, are unable to obtain precisely the same privilege.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BRUCE. I do not know whether I will yield or not.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, can the Senator inform the Senate of the width of the streets covered by his proposed amendment? With that information we would know the limit of height of the buildings to be erected on those frontages.

Mr. BRUCE. I do not believe it would alter the Senator's views about it in the least degree, after the interview I have just had with him. I am speaking with the greatest respect. The Senator has just said that he is opposed to the amendment, and what is the use of my furnishing him information that would have no influence on him?

Mr. PHIPPS. The question addressed to me was, Can not this amendment be accepted? I said:

There are those who oppose it because they believe it would interfere with the city building program, and I for that reason am opposed to it.

I said I was opposed to it, and gave my reason why it should not be adopted.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator had a perfect right to say that to me, and I had nothing more to say on the subject.

Mr. PHIPPS. My inquiry was most courteous when I asked the Senator if he could give us the width of the streets involved in this property.

Mr. BRUCE. And I propose to give the Senator a courteous reply. The Senator from Mississippi has just brought to the attention of the Senate the fact that New York Avenue has been widened, that it is a very wide street at that point, and that, therefore, instead of being entitled to a height of 140 feet, this company would really be entitled, in all probability, to erect a building with an elevation of 150 feet, according to the standard adopted.

Mr. PHIPPS. If the Senator will permit me, he has brought out the very point I was endeavoring to get. If he had given us the width of the street, we could have added 20 feet to it and would have known whether or not the amendment was necessary.

Mr. BRUCE. I can not give the width of the street to the Senator. I can obtain it, if it is a matter of any consequence.

If it would really influence the mind of the Senator from Colorado, I would be very glad to get it.

Mr. PHIPPS. It would decidedly influence me.

Mr. BRUCE. I wish the Senator had said that to me before, when I approached him. Nothing could have been more positive than his manner. Of course, he had a perfect right to say what he did say to me. He said no, that he was opposed to it. There was nothing more for me to do.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BRUCE. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. With reference to what the Senator said about the Press Club, of course, I know that the Senator does not want to state what may be erroneous. I happen to be a member of the Press Club, and I have not been approached on this question by anybody from the Press Club. I think the Press Club would like to see this legislation enacted. I do not think they would have any objection at all to an amendment which was justified by the facts, as I believe the Senator's amendment is justified by the facts.

Mr. BRUCE. All the same, I was approached by a member of the press and asked to withdraw my amendment. Of course, that is a fact of some little significance.

Mr. HARRISON. Every one knows that New York Avenue is a very wide street; and if the height of buildings is based on the width of the adjacent streets, it would seem to me that there should be more justification to this than to the other proposition. I had hoped the Senator from Kansas in charge of the bill would accept the amendment; and if it were found that the facts did not warrant it, then it could go out. I do not want to see this other legislation defeated, and I know the Senator from Maryland does not want to see it defeated.

Mr. BRUCE. Not in the least. I am not casting any reflection on the press. They have a right to submit an idea as to what is expedient for their building and what is not expedient, but I would find fault with Members of this body should they grant a special privilege to the Press Club, or to any other club, and then withhold that privilege from some citizen equally entitled to it.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I am sure there is no desire here to grant a special privilege to the Press Club, or to any other organization. The application of the Press Club has had very serious consideration before the zoning commission, before the District Commissioners, and before the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia; but the amendment which the Senator from Maryland proposes has had no consideration by anybody.

Mr. BRUCE. All those considerations by which the committee was influenced in reaching a favorable conclusion as respects this bill are necessarily involved in the consideration of the amendment I propose. It is in practically the same locality. It is subject to the same general principles of expediency and policy as the building contemplated by the bill itself. The members of the District Committee were just as well prepared, after a statement of the purposes of the amendment, to pass on the propriety of that amendment as they would have been if they had given two days' consideration in the committee room to the amendment.

Mr. CAPPER. I have no objection to granting this privilege to the property which the Senator from Maryland has in mind, but I doubt the wisdom of including it as a part of this bill.

Mr. BRUCE. I do not see that the question of wisdom arises. It is natural enough, perhaps, though I think their fears are entirely groundless, that the Press Club should desire that no amendment should be attached to their bill. As I said, I have no quarrel with them. They have a right to form their conception of what is expedient with reference to their own bill and what is not expedient; but it seems to me that the supporters of the bill here are disposed to take a perfectly selfish position, a position of selfish exclusion, and shut out everybody except just one single legislative favorite, so to speak, from the benefits of this indulgence. I say there is no justice in that and no propriety in it.

I proposed an amendment. Not one word of opposition was ever uttered by the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], not one. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDWARDS] had previously brought in an amendment asking for the same privilege with reference to a whole block in this immediate neighborhood, and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BLEAKE] objected to the consideration of that amendment on the ground that the Senator from New Jersey, by whom it was offered, was not present in the Chamber. How was that objection met?

By a statement, forsooth, from the Senator from New York that he represented the Senator from New Jersey; in other words, would take care of the inclinations and interests of the Senator from New Jersey; and, pray, how did he take care of them?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRUCE. No; I do not yield yet. I will yield afterwards to the Senator.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President—

Mr. BRUCE. I will not yield until I have made my statement with regard to these facts.

Mr. PHIPPS. I merely wanted to give the Senator information that might be of assistance to him.

Mr. BRUCE. I shall be very glad to receive it in a moment, but I want to finish my narrative, which is a very interesting one.

Yes; the Senator from New York would take care of the Senator from New Jersey; there was no occasion at all for the conscientious or friendly sympathies of the Senator from South Carolina. Then when the amendment came up for adoption and there was a mere handful of Senators here the Senator from New York sat mute in his seat and never lifted his voice in behalf of the amendment, and no sooner was the amendment defeated than he immediately disclosed his hostile attitude also toward my amendment. I do not want to say anything that is not fully justified by the occasion, but I say that that conduct is unworthy of a Senator.

Mr. COPELAND and Mr. PHIPPS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BRUCE. I yield first to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. I hardly think I am called upon to justify my act to the Senator from Maryland. His amendment is not on all fours with the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey. I told the Senate what is the fact; that in the Committee of the District of Columbia, where we had present the commissioners, the zoning commission, and the Fine Arts Commission, we gave consideration to the question whether or not we would act alone upon the application of the Press Club for this one site or whether we would act upon the whole block. It was decided by the District Committee that each case should be determined upon its merits. The Senator from New Jersey, as the Senator from Maryland will learn at a later time, is fully advised of all the circumstances and conditions under which I would present the matter to-day and which I did with his full knowledge and approval.

Mr. BRUCE. And stated that you represented him?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes; and stated that I represented him, which I did.

Mr. BRUCE. Represented all his interests in connection with that matter?

Mr. COPELAND. I think I did represent all his interests as they were conveyed to me in that matter. I think I am fully as much qualified to pass upon it as is the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. BRUCE. All I have to say is that I am filled with a sense of delight that the Senator from New York did not represent me.

Mr. COPELAND. In that particular connection I may say that I think the Senator from Maryland is overriding the practice of the Senate in a matter which has to do now, for instance, with the height of this building about which he knows and about which the rest of us do not know. I do not know what the building is. I have not had it brought to my attention. I am a member of the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia. If the Senator from Maryland would take the same interest in presenting a bill raising the height of this particular building, and presenting it with the same enthusiasm to the District Committee that he has presented it here this morning to the Senate, I have no doubt that the District Committee would gladly make a favorable report upon his bill. So far as I am concerned, as I have said to the Senator from Maryland and the Senator from Oklahoma, I shall vote for the matter, because I would be glad to see the height of all the buildings in the business section raised far above those now fixed at a lower point by the law of the District.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BRUCE. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. PHIPPS. I desire to furnish the Senator with information that may or may not be helpful to him. I am reliably informed that the width of New York Avenue along the line which the Senator's amendment covers is 130 feet. Therefore, with the permissible addition of 20 feet, a building to the height of 150 feet may be erected on New York Avenue. Therefore it would appear that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland is unnecessary to accomplish the purpose he has in mind.

The Senator addressed a question to me just as the motion was being put upon an amendment and asked me whether or not I was in favor of the bill. I would have told him, if I had had the opportunity, that I am not in favor of the bill, because I think it is departing from the established rule that has been laid down in the District for a permissible addition of 20 feet to the width of any street to determine the height of a building that may be erected. If that is a good thing for a particular location, then let us make it general for the entire business district. Do not limit it to one building, or one block or three or four blocks, or to one building at a time. Let us change the basic rule and not play favorites.

Mr. BRUCE. Then, as I understand the Senator from Colorado, the persons who propose to construct the building to which I have referred are entitled to elevate it to that height?

Mr. PHIPPS. I think so, and I will say to the Senator if the bill now before the Senate passes and becomes a law and the information I have furnished him is wrong or incorrect, I shall be glad to assist him to see that the project which he has in mind is given fair consideration.

Mr. BRUCE. Then I will say to the Senator, as we are asking not for 150 feet elevation, but only 140 feet, that it seems to me there ought not to be any objection at all to my amendment. There could not possibly be any reasonable objection made to it by anybody.

Mr. PHIPPS. Does the Senator see the necessity for it now?

Mr. BRUCE. I do, because I take for granted that the owners of this site have taken proper legal advice. They would not be here asking for the adoption of the amendment unless they had reason to believe that special action by Congress was necessary. I think that their sense of their own legal needs ought to be a more trustworthy guide than any information that the Senator from Colorado has been able hastily to collect.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I want to suggest to the Senator that if the statement of the Senator from Colorado is correct, his amendment might and would, I think, prohibit the erection of the building at the point which he has in mind in excess of 140 feet, whereas under the present law it might be erected to a height of 150 feet.

Mr. BRUCE. That is true.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator's amendment were adopted, it would become the law on the street in question with reference to the three lots.

Mr. BRUCE. I am willing that that should be so.

Mr. SIMMONS. He would restrict the height there to 140 feet, whereas under the present law the building could be erected to a height of 150 feet.

Mr. BRUCE. But I take it for granted, as I said before, that the sponsors of the amendment know what they are doing. The amendment was drafted at their instance and was handed to me to be offered, and I take for granted they have intelligent conception of what their rights are. I prefer a man's selfish comprehension of his own interests to any other idea of those interests.

Mr. SIMMONS. I appreciate the situation of the Senator who has been asked to introduce the amendment, but it occurred to me that possibly those gentlemen, in asking him to do this, did not know that they could erect a building there to a height of 150 feet. I think if they had known that fact they certainly would not have asked the Senator to introduce an amendment which would reduce the height from 150 feet to 140 feet.

Mr. BRUCE. That is their responsibility and not mine. They say 140 feet will suffice for their purposes, and if it will suffice for their purposes it will suffice for mine.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was simply making the suggestion to the Senator.

Mr. BRUCE. I appreciate most highly the friendly suggestion of the Senator, but if the Senate will adopt the amendment, I hope they will adopt it just as it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I move a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Maryland, and until that is disposed of the motion is out of order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I heard the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] make a statement to the Senator from Maryland which I am sure the Senator from Colorado in good faith understood to be the law. The Senator from Maryland doubtless relied upon it. I do not know the status of the motion now before the Senate, but the fact is that on New York Avenue, I wish to say to the Senator from Maryland, though I am opposed to his amendment, no one may erect a building in excess of a height of 120 feet. That is the extreme limit.

Mr. BRUCE. Then the width of the street has nothing to do with it?

Mr. KING. Nothing at all. The zoning commission may restrict it to 110 feet, and, of course, opposite a public building they may not build in excess of 80 feet. The Senator will recall that the Keith Building and those buildings opposite the Treasury Building may not go in excess of 80 feet.

Mr. BRUCE. It comes to this, that the Senator from Colorado innocently has misled some Senators on this matter.

Mr. PHIPPS. I am very sorry I was not familiar with the law. I was evidently misinformed.

Mr. BRUCE. I think under the circumstances the Senator should move a reconsideration of the action of the Senate on that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland.

On a division, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRUCE. I now move a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDWARDS] was rejected, and I ask that the motion lie on the table until the return of the Senator from New Jersey.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. FESS. I object. Let us have a vote on the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey was rejected.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there are no further amendments to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, there is on the calendar a similar Senate bill with the same title, being the bill (S. 3495) to amend an act regulating the height of buildings in the District of Columbia, approved June 1, 1910. I therefore move that the Senate bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of House bill 10198, making appropriations for the District of Columbia.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 10198) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1927, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. PHIPPS. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments be first considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE STATE AND OTHER DEPARTMENTS

Mr. JONES of Washington. I submit a conference report and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration. I do not think there will be any discussion or debate upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The report was read, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9795) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1927, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, 5, 6, 11, 13, 14, 15, 18, 19, and 47.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 4, 8, 9, 10, 16, 17, 20, 21, 24, 25, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 34, 35, 36, 37, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 45, 46, and 49, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 22: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 22, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$583,529"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 23: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$620,440"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 26: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 26, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment, amended to read as follows: "(including expenses of attendance upon meetings of technical and professional societies when required in connection with standardization, testing, or other official work of the bureau when incurred on the written authority of the Secretary)"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 33: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 33, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: At the end of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: " : Provided, That not exceeding $5,000 shall be expended for the acquisition of land"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 38: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 38, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named insert "$2,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 44: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 44, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "In such amounts as may be determined by the President"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 48: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 48, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment, amended to read as follows: "Appropriations herein made for the Children's Bureau shall be available for expenses of attendance at meetings for the promotion of child welfare and/or the welfare and hygiene of maternity and infancy when incurred on the written authority of the secretary."; and the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference have not agreed on amendments numbered 7 and 12.

W. L. JONES,
REED SMOOT,
LEE S. OVERMAN,
WILLIAM J. HARRIS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
MILTON W. SHREVE,
GEORGE HOLDEN TINKHAM,
W. B. OLIVER,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to proceeding with the consideration of the conference report?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the consideration of the conference report will consume some time in discussion. I am very anxious to facilitate the passage of the District of Columbia appropriation bill, and I appeal to my friend, the Senator from Washington, who is also a member of the District Committee, to let the conference report lie over until we can get the District of Columbia appropriation bill out of the way.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will not say that I will let the report lie over until we shall get the District of Columbia appropriation bill out of the way, but I will let it lie on the table for a while.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Washington a question in reference to the appropriation for the war-frauds section. Was that item agreed to or disagreed to?

Mr. JONES of Washington. We had to recede from the Senate amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. So that amount was left in?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The provision is left as contained in the bill as it passed the House of Representatives.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope the Senator from Washington will let the conference report go over, because I want to debate that feature of the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The conference report will lie on the table and be printed.

AMENDMENT TO TRADING WITH THE ENEMY ACT

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the House of Representatives be requested to return to the Senate its message announcing its agreement to the conference report on bill (S. 1226) to amend the trading with the enemy act, together with the accompanying papers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RELIEF OF FARMERS IN DROUGHT-STRICKEN AREAS

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, on yesterday the Committee on Interstate Commerce ordered reported favorably a bill for the reduction of the rate of interest on the amount owed the Government by the railroads from 6 per cent to 4½ per cent. The Washington Post of this morning in its editorial column contains an article in which it is stated:

The Treasury holds railroad securities valued at more than $300,000,000. It is proposed to extend or refund about $304,000,000 of these obligations owing by 53 roads, fixing the time of payment at 33 years and the rate of interest at 4½ per cent.

This extension of the debt is to be granted only to those railroads unable to obtain credit and unable to pay what they owe the Treasury. Secretary Mellon says:

The article continues:

"I consider it sound public policy not to extend these Government loans beyond their terms except in cases where the carrier has no prospect of obtaining private credit."

The Treasury also has on hand agricultural securities valued at about $113,000,000 in the shape of stock of the Federal land banks and intermediate banks and Federal farm-loan bonds.

Mr. President, I have not taken the floor this afternoon to object to the proposed legislation for the relief of the railroads. The argument was made in committee, and it will be made here on the floor, that the railroads were in the hands of the Government and under Government control during the time of the World War, that during that period and subsequent thereto they were in such a position that they had to have Government aid, and that the Government had preempted the bond market for its war activities, and therefore the railroads were in a measure forced to go to the Government and assume these obligations.

Whatever may have been the reason for the railroads owing the Government this amount of money, the argument is being made that as the Government can borrow its money now at 4 per cent, as the railroad is a public necessity and convenience, and as the Government should not or does not intend to make profit out of the accommodation rendered its citizens or their organized facilities, therefore we should reduce the rate of interest charged the railroads to the rate which the Government itself has to pay; that the Government should not rigidly enforce the obligations entered into at the rate of 6 per cent per annum.

Mr. President, as I said in the beginning, I am not here for the purpose of saying that this is not proper legislation; but I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that if this $304,000,000 owing the Government by the railroads shall be refunded at a rate of 4½ per cent, there will be a loss to the Government annually of $6,000,000, the difference between what was obligated to be paid and what will be paid under the provisions of the bill.

Again, the time is extended from the period of about five years yet remaining before maturity to 33 years. That length of time is given over which this lower rate of interest will be charged, and the railroads are also given that length of time within which to recoup themselves if conditions shall permit them to do so. You will mark, Mr. President, that that means an actual gift on the part of the Government of $6,000,000 annually. It is taking out of the bonds a rate of interest of 6 per cent and substituting therefor 4½ per cent; and even though the Government were unwilling to extend the time beyond the six years to 33 years, it would amount, if we should reduce the interest rate, to $6,000,000 annually.

Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the attitude of our financiers and the Government toward the railroads, which we all admit are an absolute necessity under the present forms of our organized society—commercial, social, and in every other respect. The committee reported that bill favorably, and reported it on the ground of the necessity of the railroads and the fact that they were owing the Government. On the other hand, I introduced at the beginning of this session a bill appropriating $5,000,000, to be placed by the Government in the hands of the land banks, in order that the Government might relieve the drought-stricken farmers of certain districts from the necessity of either losing their property or being forced to borrow from local banks the amount of money necessary to enable them to meet their interest charges.

Now, what occurred? The railroads obtained their loans from the Treasury at first at a rate of 6 per cent. The farmers, through the land banks and intermediate banks, pay a rate of 6¼ to 7 per cent. The seasons were so unfavorable in the Piedmont region of the Carolinas and Georgia that there was absolutely nothing made. Antecedent to that condition was the terrible deflation of 1921. Then followed for the first time in that section the advent of the boll weevil, which in the first three years practically destroyed the great cash crop of that section of the country. Then, for the first time in the history of the South so far as meteorological records go, there occurred the worst drought in the history of that section—in fact, the first drought—which absolutely destroyed the crop in a large part of these States. The greater part of the State of Georgia, throughout the Piedmont section and perhaps one-half of my State—I believe I am safe in saying that one-half of the counties of my State—absolutely failed in making a crop. The individual farmers in that section were obligated to the Federal land banks. The Government holds $113,000,000 of the securities that gave them this facility for meeting their obligations. Now that they are absolutely unable to pay they are forced to give a second mortgage or mortgage other property at the local banks, which bank charges them 8 per cent discount, which means practically 9 per cent, in order to get the money with which to meet the interest maturing on the mortgage to the land banks.

I introduced the bill to which I have referred, believing that the Government was as anxious to save the farmers of this country, who are producing that which is essential to the country's life, and just as anxious to protect and foster the agricultural industry as the railroad industry.

The reply from the president of the land bank to an inquiry addressed to him was to the effect that perhaps 90 per cent of the interest that had fallen due up to the time when I introduced the bill and made the inquiry of him had been paid; but the question was, How had they been met and paid? Just as these struggling railroads had met their obligations—by going into the market and giving extra security and getting their money at a rate of interest that they said before our committee they could not pay and live.

For the same reason and by the same token I introduced this bill, providing that the Government should turn over to the land bank $5,000,000 for the purpose of keeping at par the bonds issued to private individuals by the land bank, and simply holding the security that it already has, just as ample as the security the Government held on the railroads; for the property mortgaged to the land bank was sufficient to indemnify the Government against any loss if no interest was paid at all for two years. Therefore my proposition was that the Government should extend the payment of this interest for two years without requiring the payment of interest on the interest, without compounding the interest.

To illustrate, suppose some land owner had mortgaged his land for $10,000. His payment per year, if he amortizes it—and that is the condition on which these mortgages are granted; he amortizes the loan as well as pays his interest—is $700. He is unable to meet this payment. He goes to a bank and borrows the money to enable him to meet it. He discounts it at 8 per cent. Having his extra collateral discounted at 8 per cent, he is paying 9 per cent. He can not possibly live at that rate of interest; and in order that the bonds issued by the land bank may not be affected by the land bank itself carrying the interest for two years I have asked that the land bank shall receive this money from the Treasury, amply secured by the mortgages, and that the bank meet out of this $5,000,000 the interest due, and allow an extension for two years of the time in which the landowner, the mortgagee may be able, if the seasons are favorable, to meet his obligation to the land bank, and not be mulcted in the sum of 8 or 9 per cent interest.

As I said, the president of the land bank says that 90 per cent of those within the drought-stricken region have been paying. These notes for interest are due semiannually, and therefore during 1926 it will be practically impossible for the landowners, those who have mortgaged their land, to meet these obligations without practically destroying their hope for the future. If the Committee on Interstate Commerce, taking into consideration the distressed condition of the railroads, can offer to remit to the railroads $6,000,000 annually, is it not reasonable to ask that the farmers be granted merely an extension of time in which to meet their obligation at the same rate of interest that they are obligated to pay? The only thing lost by the Government would be the difference between the interest compounded and the straight interest. Consequently I went before the committee in regard to the matter. We have heard nothing from it. It is intimated that it may be unfavorably reported.

Mr. President, I do not know that it is necessary for me to go further. As this article says, $113,000,000 has been loaned directly by the Government to these institutions to aid the farmer, at practically an average rate of interest of 7 per cent. Bearing in mind that 7 per cent rate, let me read to you a letter from an officer of the Federal land bank to one of these unfortunate creatures in a section of country that comprises more territory than a whole State of this Union. Taking the drought-stricken region of Georgia and South Carolina, where the farmers practically made nothing at all, the area thus stricken is greater than the whole of an average State of this Union.

I want to read this letter from this land-bank official. I will not read the name of the person to whom it is addressed nor the name of the official, but it is an official letter:

DEAR SIR: When you accepted this loan you agreed to pay, on stipulated dates, the amortization installments for the above amount. Your failure to pay the above installment on date due is a violation of the contract under which this loan was granted. This violation gives the bank an absolute right to declare your entire loan due and payable forthwith and without notice to you. This default is a failure on your part to cooperate with your neighbors who form your association and who have indorsed your note to secure the loan, thereby becoming to a great extent responsible for its existence. Your neighbors, your indorsers, have met their obligations to the bank; and it is therefore this bank's duty to them as well as to itself to see that you now come on in performance of your duty to them as well as to the bank.

In view of these facts, you can see that it is decidedly to your advantage to at once pay the above installment, with interest thereon for default at 8 per cent from date due up to and including date on which remittance is received at this bank. Do not ask us to grant you an extension of time on this installment, as we have absolutely no right or desire to grant you favors which we can not grant to each and every borrower from the bank. We expect you to remit before laying this letter aside.

Now, mark the contrast between our attitude toward the railroads and our attitude toward the farmer. I will reread the latter part of the second paragraph of this letter:

In view of these facts, you can see that it is decidedly to your advantage to at once pay the above installment, with interest thereon for default at 8 per cent from date due up to and including date on which remittance is received at this bank.

The railroads failed to meet the interest due to the Government on bonds which they obligated themselves to meet at 6 per cent; and the action of this body is to meet and solemnly promise, by the report of the bill favorably, to reduce the rate of interest from 6 per cent to 4 per cent. In this case they propose that when Providence, nature, absolutely denies the farmer, the man conducting the basic industry of the country, the power to meet his obligations he is to be penalized without notice by means of an increased rate of interest to 8 per cent, and a threat to foreclose the mortgage and turn him out of doors; and his only recourse is to apply to some local bank at the same rate of interest, 8 per cent, in order to be permitted to go on and produce the food and clothing for this country.

Mr. President, the bill for the relief of the railroads will not pass this body until recognition is given to the claims of those whom the Government recognizes as constituting the vast unorganized army upon whose aggregate production the whole superstructure of America stands. I congratulate this body that we did in part recognize the claim of the unorganized producers of this country upon the Government to the extent that we gave them the privilege and facility of mortgaging their land in order to get enough money to meet the deficiency between the cost of what they produced and the price they got for it. They had to mortgage the very capital, the very basis out of which their living was to be made, in order to carry on the work so essential to the welfare of this country. They then instituted the intermediate credit banks, and I myself looked into the workings of that system. It does in some degree add a facility for the financing of agriculture; but the rate of interest and the method by which one obtains it is very little removed from the ordinary process of borrowing from an ordinary bank.

I had hoped that the Senate would take cognizance of the distressed condition of these people. I want to read one other letter from a man who is not only a farmer but one of the leading attorneys in my State. In a letter to me he says:

I notice in to-day's papers that you propose that the Government lend to the drought sufferers of last year, those who borrowed money from the Federal land banks on mortgages on their lands, and who, on account of the drought, can not meet their interest payments, money to pay off the interest. You are absolutely correct in saying that unless relief of that kind or some other is extended to these people hundreds of them will lose their lands. Something of the kind should be done, and done at once, or else an act of Congress should be passed, if such could be done, whereby the land banks would extend the time for these payments, and during such extended time there should be no interest charged.

It is pitiful to realize, as I and hundreds of others in the northern and western sections of South Carolina do, that scores and hundreds of our farmers can not meet their interest or amortization payments, nor can they pay their taxes, for they made nothing—

He italicizes and emphasizes that fact—last year on account of the drought that prevailed in these sections of our State; and they are among our best people. With their lands sold from under them and they made homeless and landless, what interest can they have further in our State? And why should they lose their homes for no fault of their own, but because Providence failed to favor them?

I do hope that you may be instrumental in doing something for this class of our people, else they will soon be made to join the tenant class in our State that is growing by leaps and bounds. Our county papers in South Carolina are filled week by week with sales of lands for taxes. It were better for the State and the counties to lose these taxes than to render people homeless and transform them from home owners to the tenant class. As you well know, the burden of government, Federal and State, county and municipal, is growing yearly. One can but wonder sometimes what the end will be.

This afternoon I shall have no more to say on this subject than what I have already stated to the Senate; but I am going to insist that the Committee on Banking and Currency shall report that bill out, whether favorably or unfavorably, so that the measure may be before this body. I hope they will take action on it before this railroad proposition comes up. If they do not, or even if they do, I propose to add to the railroad relief bill the proposition I have already advanced—relief for those who, from no fault of theirs, no manipulation of stocks and bonds, no waterlog or anything, have sustained this great loss. In fact, they were the victims of the lack of water, as these others, perhaps, were the victims of too much water.

I shall propose an amendment to that bill providing for the relief of these bankrupt and distressed producers in the agricultural districts of the Southeast, as we propose to come to the rescue, and perhaps rightfully, of railroads which find themselves in such a condition that they can not carry on without relief.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Hattigan, one of its clerks, returned to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the message from the Senate announcing its agreement to the conference report on the bill (S. 1226) to amend the trading with the enemy act.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of bill (H. R. 10198) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1927, and for other purposes.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, the formal reading of the bill having been dispensed with, I ask that the bill be read for action on the committee amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will proceed to read the bill.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "Office of corporation counsel," on page 5, line 14, after the figures "$40,040" to strike out the comma and the words "and no part of this appropriation shall be available for the compensation of any person giving less than full time to his official duties;" so as to make the paragraph read:

Corporation counsel, including extra compensation as general counsel of the Public Utilities Commission, $6,000, and other personal services in accordance with the classification act of 1923, $34,040; in all, $40,040.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Coroner's office," on page 5, line 19, to increase the appropriation for personal services in accordance with the classification act of 1923, from $6,200 to $7,100.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Public Utilities Commission," on page 7, line 8, before the word "personal," to strike out "attorney at law, $6,000, and for other" and insert "For"; and in line 10, after the figures "$40,620," strike out the semicolon and the words "in all, $46,620; and no part of this appropriation shall be available for the compensation of any person giving less than full time to his official duties," so as to make the paragraph read:

For personal services in accordance with the classification act of 1923, $40,620.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Office of the director of traffic," on page 8, line 21, before the word "such," to insert "not exceeding $350,000 of," so as to make the paragraph read:

For personal services in accordance with the classification act of 1923; for purchase, installation, and maintenance of traffic lights, signals, controls, and markers, painting white lines, labor, traffic surveys, city planning in relation to traffic regulation and control, and such other expenses as may be necessary in the judgment of the commissioners, $100,000, and in addition not exceeding $350,000 of such fees as may be received during the fiscal years 1926 and 1927 for re-issuing motor-vehicle operators' permits, which shall be applied exclusively to the purchase, installation, and maintenance of traffic lights and additional new street lamps and fixtures incidental to such work.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have had the opportunity of associating myself with the able Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] upon this bill, and with most of its provisions I am in hearty accord. I take this occasion to pay tribute to the very faithful service which has been rendered by the Senator from Colorado, not only in the preparation of the bill but in all of his activities in connection with the District of Columbia.

This is perhaps one of the very few amendments in the bill with which I do not agree. I am entirely dissatisfied with the traffic director and his activities and the multitude of rules and regulations, amounting to hundreds, promulgated by him and his subordinates, many of which have been changed and modified and more of which must be changed and modified. I think we are giving too much authority to him and we are making too large appropriations.

I think we made a mistake when we passed the law creating the office of the director of traffic in that form. If we had given additional power to the chief of police and given him an assistant charged with the responsibility of formulating and enforcing under his chief, and, of course, under the District Commissioners, such rules and regulations as were necessary under the authority which then existed, we would not have had the mortifying experiences which have followed the new traffic law and the attempts to enforce it by the present director of traffic.

The amendment is before us. I shall not make any motion to strike it out or to modify it, but I did not feel that I should permit the bill to go through without expressing my disapproval of the traffic arrangements, of the maladministration of the authority and power conferred, and, indeed, of many of the foolish and absurd rules and regulations which have been promulgated.

This bill proposes to give the director of traffic a large amount of money, nearly three or four hundred thousand dollars, for lighting and for experimentation without sufficient restrictions. I am opposed to it. I think it unwise, and I regret that I am compelled to dissent from the action of the committee with respect to this item.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill whether adequate appropriations are recommended to take care of the streets in Washington?

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, that was one problem to which the committee gave more thought and study than to any other. With a desire to avoid increasing the rate of taxation, which would perhaps be necessary had we added to the amount of the bill as it came from the House, that is to say, increasing the total of the amount, the committee endeavored to find places wherein certain activities might possibly be deferred for a year without disastrous results. The committee believes that it was successful in finding some such places. In two instances, where appropriations have been allotted to school buildings, the work would not require the entire amount during the year, as in two other cases, of the building of gymnasiums and assembly halls, aggregating $150,000; and the committee has added by amendment, if the amendment shall be approved, $400,000 for the resurfacing of the streets.

The data which we have collected show that our program to-day is just about four years behind what it should be, estimating the proper expected life of asphalt and other pavings at 30 years, as against 20 years, which is accepted in many cities as a life that should be satisfactory. We have accumulated year by year cases of necessity of resurfacing, and by reason of that we are to-day expending large amounts for keeping up little repairs, doing patch work on the streets, which is becoming unduly expensive. Many of the streets are being patched.

For the streets that are 30 years of age or over we find a surface of eight hundred and fifteen thousand and odd square yards, to replace which will cost $2,345,000, and yet we have only been resurfacing at the rate of about three to four hundred thousand dollars a year, and the bulk of the item—which has unfortunately all been combined in one, repairs and resurfacing—has gone to repairs instead of actually replacing the surface of the streets.

The Senate committee hopes to convince the Members of the House: First, that those items should be separated; secondly, that we should adopt a four or five year program, which will enable us to catch up at least at the end of four or five years. By adding this $400,000 to the bill in the way which we have done it we are really providing for only one year's work, where nearly five years' work has accumulated.

Mr. SWANSON. I do not know who is responsible for it, but it seems to me that the streets of Washington, especially the thoroughfares, are in as wretched a condition as one would find in little towns of four or five thousand people. This is the Capital of the Nation, and I have never seen the thoroughfares of the city in worse conditions. I hope the committee will succeed in getting an appropriation sufficient to put the streets in a condition suitable to the Capital of this Nation.

I suggest to the Senator in charge of the bill that it seems to me that in Washington there should be higher automobile taxes, which could be used to take care of the streets. It seems to me that less is charged for automobile licenses in this city and less for gasoline than is charged in other cities where the taxes are dedicated to taking care of the streets. I suggest to those in charge of District affairs that there should be a fund which could be used for this purpose. I know somebody is responsible for the wretched condition of the Washington streets.

Mr. PHIPPS. I may say to the Senator that the gasoline tax is bringing in a very considerable revenue, but, unfortunately, for those who desire to see the streets resurfaced, a very large amount has been allocated to the paving of the streets and the development of new streets, where, of course, the abutting property owner pays 50 per cent of the cost of his frontage. Our desire is to divert more money from the gas tax to resurfacing, and that is what your committee is endeavoring to do, adding $400,000 to the $250,000 which the House appropriated for that purpose, and about $200,000 which, I think, was carried in the deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. SWANSON. I have gone out to the suburbs of the city, and the streets and pavements are much better there than in the lower parts of the town, where we find the main traveled thoroughfares. I think the committee has recommended a good appropriation, if the main thoroughfares are to be taken care of, but the thoroughfares down town in the city of Washington are more suitable to towns of about four or five thousand inhabitants.

Mr. PHIPPS. Let me say to the Senator that I have made it my personal duty to travel around as many of the side streets, those paralleling the main thoroughfares, as possible, and in that way to convince myself at least that this resurfacing program must be gone ahead with, and that without further delay; otherwise the repairs will eat us up.

Mr. SWANSON. Am I to understand that relief is to be given piecemeal, about 25 per cent a year, and that for three or four years a great many of the streets are to be in the same wretched condition in which we find them now?

Mr. PHIPPS. I think not. I was speaking of the number of streets having a surface over 30 years of age. I believe that by using the appropriation in the deficiency bill, and the amount in this bill, we can have the streets in reasonably good condition at the beginning of the following fiscal year.

Mr. SWANSON. Can the city of Washington use any of the gasoline tag and automobile tax for the resurfacing of the streets without the consent of Congress?

Mr. PHIPPS. No; the commissioners can not use any money without an appropriation by Congress.

Mr. SWANSON. Why do we not dedicate a certain amount of the automobile tax, and a certain amount of the gasoline tax, entirely to the resurfacing of the streets, so that we will not have to wait?

Mr. PHIPPS. The commissioners themselves have designated various streets to be resurfaced out of that tax, and your committee has added to that very largely. It has more than doubled the recommendation of the House.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator ought to put in the Record at this point the amount that was added for the purpose of resurfacing the streets, unless the Senator has made that statement already.

Mr. PHIPPS. That is the amount I have stated. The House provided an item for repairs and resurfacing of about $270,000, to be devoted to resurfacing of streets that are not definitely designated in the bill, and there are about half a dozen items which are designated which will aggregate, as I recall, about $100,000, to which the Senate committee added $400,000.

Mr. KING. I want the Record to show that the Senate committee added approximately $500,000 for resurfacing and for needed improvements above the provisions of the House, with respect to resurfacing and similar repairs, and in order to accomplish that purpose we have been compelled to reduce the appropriations which ought to apply to some of the suburban parts of the city; but the wretched condition of the streets in the business parts of the city, as suggested by the Senator from Virginia, constrained the committee to pursue the course which it did. Some of our friends in the suburban parts of the city will have to wait until next year, although the bill, I think, deals very generously with all parts of the city. The committee visited all sections of the city, the streets of the suburban districts as well as in the central and business sections of the city, and attempted to make a fair and just allocation of the funds which we deemed available and reasonably necessary for street purposes for the coming year.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Colorado what the situation is with reference to the widening of H Street and the plans that the committee have in mind?

Mr. PHIPPS. As to the widening of the street, the work under the deficiency appropriation bill will probably be undertaken very soon. That carries an item for the widening of the street. The House had put an item in the pending bill to continue the work. They had no Budget estimate for it. The committee went over the ground and believed that was one item that could be allowed to go over for another year, and by that time we will see what the effect of the widening of the street will be. The attitude of the committee is not one of opposition but one of expediency.

Mr. COPELAND. I understand the Senator feels that perhaps it could not be done now; but—

Mr. PHIPPS. I was confused, and the clerk of the committee corrects me. The widening of H Street is a matter to which the committee is not opposed, but it was thought desirable to leave it out this year.

Mr. COPELAND. But there is a prospect that it may be taken up within a year or so?

Mr. PHIPPS. I would think so. In the natural course of events it would probably come in next year; but I think some of the citizens who would be affected by it, who would be called upon to pay a large amount of the costs, are really not ready for it yet.

Mr. COPELAND. It depends largely upon getting the full consent of those property owners?

Mr. PHIPPS. Approximately. I would not say it would require full consent.

Mr. COPELAND. May I ask the Senator what the situation is with reference to Sherman Circle?

Mr. PHIPPS. The committee were impressed with the necessity of taking care of that situation, and we believe we have done so.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator.

Mr. KING. Before proceeding further with the committee amendments we passed over an item on page 4 to which I wish to direct attention. It does not call for any amendment. In lines 20, 21, and 22 we appropriate $155,240 for the assessor's office. I appreciate the fact that the point I am about to make would be general legislation and therefore would be subject to a point of order if I should tender an amendment to cover it. But I want to make just one observation, hoping that the assessor's office will adopt the suggestion which I am about to make. If not, I feel that some general legislation is imperatively needed.

I have received hundreds of complaints from taxpayers of the District to the effect that they receive no notice whatever of their tax assessments. They say that their complaint applies to real estate as well as personal property. By reason of getting no notice of the assessments levied against their property, in many instances property has been sold without their knowledge. Perhaps there was some negligence upon their part. I express no opinion with reference to that. In some instances, when they would go to pay their taxes and thought they had discharged their entire liability, where they would have a number of segregated pieces of property, they would not discover for a number of years afterwards that they had failed to pay the tax upon some piece of property. One case which was brought to my attention was with reference to a piece of improved property, the owner of which was awakened one morning by finding a number of people out upon the property tearing down some of his trees and attempting to plant others. When he made inquiry they said, "This property was sold at tax sale and now belongs to us."

I am advised that there are a number of men in the District forming a sort of combination for the purpose of securing tax titles, and they are profiting inordinately by the course which they pursue. I do not want to condemn or criticize the assessor's office, but many criticisms have been lodged with me by reason of the course pursued. Those who are in the coterie and buy these tax titles, of course, before they will give a quitclaim or make any relinquishment, exact enormous profits, and in some instances I am told the owners have had the utmost difficulty in securing their own property.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

Mr. KING. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. Do I understand that a person whose property is sold for taxes in the District of Columbia has not a certain time within which to redeem that property?

Mr. KING. I think that is true.

Mr. SMOOT. Then we ought to have legislation on the subject immediately.

Mr. KING. I mean to say that they have a period of redemption.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator know the length of time?

Mr. KING. No; I do not recall it. Some of the letters which I have received state the fact and the time of redemption, but they claim that, getting no notices, they are misled as to the amount of their taxes and do not know the exact amount, and where they have a number of tracts or parcels of land or various kinds of personal property they are unable to determine, without searching the records, the aggregate amount which is due, and frequently, or at least occasionally, the entire amount is not paid, without fault upon their part, and they awaken to a realization of the fact later that some tax title is outstanding against their property by virtue of a tax deed.

I hope the assessor's office will institute a fair and proper system of notification to the taxpayers with reference to their taxes. If the appropriation in the pending bill is not adequate to enable them to perform that duty properly, we ought to increase it, but the large amount which I have indicated it seems to me should answer every legitimate demand.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I have no fault to find with the rather liberal provision which appears to be made for the director of traffic, and I have no fault to find with the plan for improving the streets and taking care of the streets. The suggestion which the junior Senator from Utah has just made is an important one.

There is a condition in the city of Washington that I think is most deplorable. I am not in a position to put my finger on the trouble, but anyone who reads the newspapers from day to day must recognize the fact that the casualties on the streets of Washington arising from alleged automobile accidents are simply enormous. There seems to be a sort of impression here that the pedestrian has no rights on the streets at all. Even the right to use the sidewalk is sometimes questioned, because automobiles go after the pedestrian even on the sidewalks. Day after day people are killed here in Washington—an elderly lady run over and killed, a child 9 years old run over and killed—and what happens? Mr. Coroner makes a so-called investigation or inquiry and decides that there has been an unavoidable accident. In nine cases out of ten, I venture to say, the people who are reckless with regard to human life escape on the ground that what has happened was an unavoidable accident.

There is something wrong somewhere with the whole system. I do not know just what it is. I do not know whether the pending bill takes care of the pay of the coroner in the District or not, but it seems to me the coroner is more or less in a conspiracy with the automobile operators and owners, and the average individual who has to walk and is not able to fly and who ought to have some rights on the streets is utterly ignored by all of them. A man takes his life in his hand whenever he starts out to walk in the city of Washington. It is an awful situation.

I have not had the time to investigate as to the statistics and to compare conditions here and accidents which happen here with conditions in other cities, but it does seem to me the situation has reached an alarming point in Washington. Day after day we read about people being run over and killed by automobiles. Mr. Coroner sits and decides that there has been an unavoidable accident in practically every case. Nobody gets punished. It simply means that the people who venture to use the highways, which ought to be available for their use, are taking their chances every day and are liable to be run over. There is something wrong with the situation. I hope the committee have had it brought to their attention and will do something about it.

Mr. PHIPPS. May I say to the Senator that the committee had before it not only the commissioners, but the director of traffic, Mr. Eldridge. The hearings show that some 11 pages are taken up by the testimony of Mr. Eldridge as to investigations made of the various types of electric signals and automatic control of traffic on the highways, what the experience has been in other large municipalities, and the details as to the lighting, cost, and all such things. In response to a question by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] as to the result of the lighting system, among other things, Mr. Eldridge said:

On Sixteenth Street there were 51 accidents during November and December before the lights were put on. They were put on during the early part of January and we have had 30 accidents on the street since then. During November and December there were 12 serious accidents and 1 death. During the months of January and February there were only four serious accidents and no deaths.

Senator PHIPPS. What was it in March?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. We have not received the figures for March as yet.

This hearing was about the latter part of March. We did not have very much testimony with reference to traffic conditions. It was rather scattering as to the accidents, but the belief was very strong upon the part of everyone that the automatic control of traffic by the signal lights was proving a success, that it would take a little time to accustom the people to it, but that pedestrians are already learning that the safe time to cross a street is when the lights show green or white and never when they show red; that they should not attempt to cross facing a red light.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator if the question of glaring headlights that automobilists are required to use in the District of Columbia has ever been discussed in connection with accidents in the District?

Mr. PHIPPS. It has not been discussed before the Appropriations Committee. It has been discussed before the District Committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I can not understand why the District of Columbia should require automobiles to be equipped with glaring headlights, so that one driving toward them can not see even a quarter of a block when they shine in his face. The dim lights are not used, but automobiles are compelled to use the glaring lights.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I say to my colleague that in a recent hearing I called the attention of Mr. Eldridge to that fact, and expressed my disapproval of the method and the operation of the present plan, and he said that was the right way. Of course, I disagree with him.

Mr. SMOOT. I know when I am out in the evenings, when I meet an automobile I tell the driver of my automobile to go just as close to the other side of the street as he can and stop.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the senior Senator from Utah yield to me?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I understand that a driver must use the dimmers and not permit the full light; that to do so is against the regulation.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish I might take the Senator from Ohio out riding with me some evening and let him see to what extent the dimmers are being used.

Mr. FESS. I myself do not drive an automobile, but I ride in an automobile almost every day and especially during the evening, and the regulation to which I refer is the one under which the driver always operates. It is against the regulation to use any lights but the dimmers.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I wish to say in reference to what the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] has observed regarding the lights at the intersection of Sixteenth and Fifteenth Streets and Massachusetts Avenue, and at other points, that I think they have been very satisfactory. I think they have been the means of preventing a great many accidents. I happen to live at the corner of Massachusetts Avenue and Fifteenth Street and there was an accident there almost every day and every night, sometimes two or three a day, until those lights were installed. Since then I do not think there have been any accidents.

Mr. FESS. If the automobilists will obey the signal lights, there is no reason at all why there should be any accidents.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is a very admirable system, and also protects the pedestrian if he will observe the signals. I am not excusing the pedestrian who recklessly goes across the street when he knows he ought not to attempt it; but most of the accidents are happening, I think, outside of the zone where there has not been an installation of the green and red lights, where that system is not in operation, perhaps down town and in other portions of the city. But I think there has been a very great improvement in that regard. The installation of this system has been most helpful, and I think has been the means of preventing a great many accidents. Of course, those lights can not be extended everywhere. Accidents are still happening, and they constitute quite a serious menace, it seems to me, in other parts of the city.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, just a word. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] has called attention to the statement made by Mr. Eldridge respecting accidents on Sixteenth Street. The fact is that there was bound to be a diminution in the number of accidents after the installation of the electric lights for the reason that people would not travel on Sixteenth Street; the traffic there was cut in half; perhaps for a period of six weeks or two months after the installation of the lights it was cut to less than 25 per cent compared with what it was prior to that time. Motorists would travel down the streets on either side of Sixteenth Street rather than down Sixteenth Street.

Mr. FESS. I want to say that I can confirm that statement. A great many persons avoid a street where the lights have been installed in order not to be held up.

Mr. SMOOT. I myself do so.

Mr. FESS. Many persons do.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire further to say that Mr. Eno, who, perhaps, has given more time to the consideration of the subject of vehicular traffic than has any other man in the United States, is averse to this system of lighting and signaling. In his latest pamphlet of, perhaps, 100 or 150 pages he discusses that question and again emphasizes, as he has done in a former edition of his work, his objections to the system.

Mr. FESS. After all, the whole trouble is we have too many automobiles.

Mr. KING. After all, Mr. President, we do not have intelligent and rational traffic regulations and intelligent and rational handling of the motor traffic. If we had one head it would be far better. Then if that head were the head of the police and he could coordinate all of those activities, it would be very much better than to have the present system which prevails in this city.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the heading "Contingent and miscellaneous expenses," on page 10, line 16, after the words "Board of," to strike out "Charities" and insert "Public Welfare," so as to make the paragraph read:

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I should like to make an inquiry in reference to certain items on page 42.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me for a moment, there is one amendment I should like to have disposed of before we reach page 42. I desire to offer an amendment to come in on page 41, line 22. At that point I move to insert the words "modified as the limits of the site may require."

In explanation of that amendment I will say that typical school building plans are being used wherever possible. In one or two instances, however, it has been found that they do not quite fit in with the topography and, therefore, it is necessary, as in this case, to permit a slight modification of the plans.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator means to insert the words he has indicated after the word "school" in line 22?

Mr. PHIPPS. Yes; the amendment comes in in line 22 after the word "school."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 41, line 22, after the word "school" and the comma, it is proposed to insert the words "modified as the limits of the site may require."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I hope the chairman of the committee, while he is referring to the schoolhouses, will call attention to the schoolhouse near the Wardman Park Hotel and what some denominate the rather atrocious style of architecture which characterizes it.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that following an inspection the committee had a conference with the architect, who brought in several school plans, which are still on exhibition in the committee room, and some suggestions were made which we hope will prove helpful.

Mr. KING. I hope so.

Mr. PHIPPS. As to the Calvert Street School, it is only fair to say that when the school building shall have been completed and shall have become a full-fledged building, so to speak, instead of being two-thirds of one, it will present a much better appearance.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question about the items on page 42?

Mr. PHIPPS. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. Perhaps we can make one bite of the cherry. In the first place, what occasion is there for increasing the appropriation provided for the Langley Junior High School from $100,000 and providing for a contract up to $400,000?

Then there are two other items, one beginning on line 8 and extending to line 11, which reads:

For the construction of a combined gymnasium and assembly hall at the Petworth School in accordance with the original plans for the construction of said building, $75,000.

That is stricken out.

There is also stricken out the item on page 42, which reads:

For the construction of a combined gymnasium and assembly hall at the West School in accordance with the original plans for the construction of said building, $75,000.

My information is that those two items ought to stay in the bill and that the committee is making a mistake in recommending that they be stricken out of the House bill. At the same time, there is an item on that page increasing the appropriation for the Langley Junior High School by a considerable amount, and a contract is authorized up to $400,000 for that school.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I wish first to ask the Senator, if he will, to refer on page 41 to the item in reference to the Garnet-Patterson School. In that instance the committee reduced the appropriation from $300,000 to $200,000. We cut off $100,000 there; we added $100,000 to the appropriation for the Langley Junior High School and authorized the commissioners to enter into a contract for the completion of the addition to that school, because we believed that it was in the interest of economy; that they could make a better contract at a lower cost for a completed building than by letting the contract piecemeal. For that we had the consent and approval not only of the superintendent of schools but of the commissioners as well. We asked how much was involved; and while it is true the superintendent's guess of $50,000 was pretty high, the chances are that a considerable saving will be effected by contracting for the entire work at one time.

Mr. FLETCHER. Let me ask the Senator precisely where this school is located and what the attendance there amounts to. I am not quite certain about the location of the school.

Mr. PHIPPS. The school is located on T Street NE. The site of the building was pointed out to our committee a year or two ago, and this is for the addition. By building that addition so as to include the assembly hall they will get a better contract than they otherwise would.

Mr. FLETCHER. Can the Senator give us an idea of the attendance there—the number of teachers and pupils?

Mr. PHIPPS. They are running from 1,100 to 1,200, we are told, in these junior high schools. This particular school is overcrowded now.

As to the Petworth School, lines 8 to 11, that is a grade school. Your committee visited that school, and also the West

School, covered in lines 15 to 17, inclusive. Those schools have playgrounds right adjoining them. They have well-finished, high-ceiling basement rooms which are used for class exercises, where the students bring their dumbbells, wands, or other gymnastic apparatus in bad weather. Of course, no doubt, they exercise out of doors in good weather. It was thought that those two schools could well go for another year, because, as I have stated, your committee wanted to find places in the House set-up where activities might be deferred for a year, so that we might divert that amount of money to the purpose of resurfacing streets without increasing the total amount of the appropriation, which would involve an increase in taxation.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the Senator believes that eventually, perhaps, these accommodations will be provided. They are very important, but not absolutely essential things, I take it—the gymnasiums and assembly halls in these schools?

Mr. PHIPPS. I do not hesitate to say to the Senator that those of the committee who visited the West School and the Petworth School felt that we could put over that work for a year. We are not opposed to furnishing the assembly halls and gymnasiums; we think it should be done; but we do believe that there is more pressing, urgent need for the resurfacing of these streets.

Mr. FLETCHER. With that assurance, I shall not make any objection.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the action of the Senate whereby the second amendment on page 18 was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote whereby the amendment was agreed to will be reconsidered.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to have an explanation from the chairman of the item I spoke to him about yesterday. I will say, before he makes the explanation, that it has been represented to me that the Citizens' Association of Chevy Chase, the Citizens' Association of Mount Pleasant, and the Connecticut Avenue Citizens' Association have all petitioned for this grading; and I should like to know the reason of the committee for taking the action they did.

Mr. PHIPPS. I can perhaps locate the ground for the Senator by asking him if he recalls the old mill on Park Road. Proceeding up Rock Creek, the first turning to the left is the Broad Branch Road; and perhaps 800 yards beyond that turning, or a little over an eighth of a mile, not over a quarter of a mile, is a small draw or valley that comes down from the direction of the Zoo into the Broad Branch Road. The Aububon Terrace location is to the left side, a sloping hillside characteristic of those in Rock Creek Park, which is now fully wooded, with good forest trees on it; and the new street, as proposed in the House bill, would come down into Broad Branch Road at right angles to it.

Mr. LENROOT. Where is Linean Avenue?

Mr. PHIPPS. I do not know where Linean Avenue is on the high ground.

Mr. LENROOT. Where is it in relation to Connecticut Avenue?

Mr. PHIPPS. I could not locate it. I only know that if it continues through to Connecticut Avenue, as it no doubt does, it must be 10 or 12 blocks farther out than Tilden Street, which is an entrance to the park.

Mr. LENROOT. Would it be sufficient to say that it would connect Twenty-ninth Street with Broad Branch Road and make another road from Rock Creek Park to Twenty-ninth Street?

Mr. PHIPPS. Twenty-ninth Street has not yet been opened between Cathedral Avenue and Connecticut Avenue, nor has it been opened on the farther side of Connecticut Avenue, according to my recollection; but the point of the whole situation, as the committee sees it, is this:

Here is a wooded slope affecting Rock Creek Park. If that hillside is denuded of trees the drainage will go into the sewers instead of the water from rainfall coming into Rock Creek; and all those interested in the park think it most important to keep up the flow there to the highest point possible. It looks to us as though this were really a real estate movement for the further development of a new section of territory; and if the people who own the ground are so desirous of cutting down those trees and throwing open that ground for the building of homes they should be sufficiently interested to pay for the grading. Ordinarily the grading, as the Senator may know, is paid for by the city. The cost of the paving is divided.

Mr. LENROOT. Has the street been cut through and the ground cleared?

Mr. PHIPPS. Oh, no; there is no evidence of a street there that can be discovered from Broad Branch Road, at least, nor do I think you can see any evidence of it. There are some houses on the high ground I should say about half a mile back from Broad Branch Road. You can see houses there.

Mr. LENROOT. If the matter goes to conference, I take it the Senator would be willing to listen to any representations that might be made?

Mr. PHIPPS. Oh, we are quite willing to receive any further information about it.

Mr. LENROOT. I will talk with the Senator about it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment which has just been reconsidered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 42, line 2, after the word "School," to strike out "$1,000" and insert "including an assembly hall and gymnasium, $200,000; and the commissioners are authorized to enter into contract or contracts, as in this act provided, for said addition at a cost not to exceed $400,000," so as to read:

For the construction of an addition to the Langley Junior High School, including an assembly hall and gymnasium, $200,000; and the commissioners are authorized to enter into contract or contracts, as in this act provided, for said addition at a cost not to exceed $400,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 42, after line 7, to strike out:

For the construction of a combined gymnasium and assembly hall at the Petworth School in accordance with the original plans for the construction of said building, $75,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 42, after line 14, to strike out:

For the construction of a combined gymnasium and assembly hall at the West School in accordance with the original plans for the construction of said building, $75,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 42, line 18, after the word "all," to strike out "$1,620,000" and insert "$1,270,000," so as to read:

In all, $1,270,000 to be disbursed and accounted for as "Building and grounds, public schools, surplus revenue fund," and for that purpose shall constitute one fund, and remain available until expended: Provided, That no part of such fund shall be used for or on account of any school building not herein specified.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 43, line 5, before the word "bidder," to insert "responsible," so as to read:

None of the money appropriated by this act shall be paid or obligated toward the construction of or addition to any building the whole and entire construction of which, exclusive of heating, lighting, and plumbing, shall not have been awarded in one or a single contract, separate and apart from any other contract, project, or undertaking, to the lowest responsible bidder complying with all the legal requirements as to a deposit of money or the execution of a bond, or both, for the faithful performance of the contract.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 44, line 10, after the word "fund," to strike out the colon and the following provisos:

Provided, That no part of the appropriation herein made shall be expended for the purchase of any site the cost of which shall exceed the full value assessment of such property last made before purchase thereof plus 25 per cent of such assessed value: Provided further, That if any of the sites above enumerated can not be purchased under said limitation as to price then any of said moneys remaining unexpended or unobligated by reason of such price limitation, plus the unexpended balance of the appropriation of $154,000 contained in the second deficiency act, fiscal year 1925, on account of the Park View School, which is hereby reappropriated, may be expended, subject to said limitation as to price, in the purchase of any or all other land authorized to be acquired in the five-year school building program act, approved February 26, 1925 (43 Stat. p. 986).

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, just a word at that point.

I think it is only fair to say that the committee looks upon the proposition set forth by the House as a most important matter, and one which should not have approval without serious consideration. While it may find that some of the language included within that stricken out is proper, and should remain in the bill, the only clean way in which to handle the matter is to have the whole situation before us when we go to conference. Therefore we propose to eliminate all of the language included within the provisos, so that we can discuss it with the representatives on the part of the House.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I desire to ask a question of the Senator. I notice, for example, on page 48—we are now on page 44—a similar proviso, or a proviso in part similar.

Mr. PHIPPS. Wherever the limitation of 25 per cent above the latest appraised value occurs the committee recommends striking it out, so that the whole question may be considered in conference.

Mr. WILLIS. Does not that appeal to the Senator as being a wise provision?

Mr. PHIPPS. Leaving it in?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes.

Mr. PHIPPS. There are arguments on both sides, I am perfectly frank to admit, but the arguments against it presented by the commissioners, presented by the superintendent of parks, presented by two or three other officials, and presented by citizens' organizations were, to the minds of the committee, stronger, certainly more definite, and more insistent than those that were received in favor of it.

Mr. WILLIS. I have the greatest confidence in the judgment of the Senator from Colorado, particularly upon a business proposition; but it did seem to me that that was rather wise legislation. It would prevent the public from being help up. It seems to me it is good legislation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am not quite in accord with the action of the committee with respect to this matter; and yet at the time it was under consideration I felt constrained not to express any dissent.

There are some reasons which might prompt the committee to take this course. I shall not enumerate them. It is possible—indeed, it is quite certain—if those handling the money will act with prudence, that they may secure results which will be satisfactory in the acquisition of school sites. I want to say now that I have felt that some of the school sites have cost entirely too much, and that the District has been held up; and I do not approve of some of the methods adopted in acquiring these school sites and the lack of vigor, in my judgment, in prosecuting the suits for condemnation where the District was forced to go into the courts to exercise the right of eminent domain.

I do not want to criticize the lawyers who handled the cases; but I do express my opinion, from the investigations which I made, that the District has paid too much for school sites; and if any proper way could be adopted to secure better results and to limit the payments for the school sites, I should be very glad to give my support to it. I assent to this action because I am at a loss to suggest a better method. I do hope, however, that those who handle the money, if they are held up, will refuse to purchase, even though there shall be some delay. In some sections of the District the prices charged have been extortionate, far beyond what was reasonable and right, far above the assessments which have been levied by the city; and I do hope that in future purchases there will be wiser discretion and better judgment used than have been exercised in the past.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 45, line 2, to increase the appropriation for rent of school buildings and grounds, storage and stock rooms, from $12,000 to $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Metropolitan police, salaries," on page 46, line 19, after the name "District of Columbia," to strike out "including the present assistant property clerk of the police department, who shall be appointed a sergeant on the Metropolitan police force," so as to make the paragraph read:

For the pay and allowances of officers and members of the Metropolitan police force, in accordance with the act entitled "An act to fix the salaries of the Metropolitan police force, the United States park police force, and the fire department of the District of Columbia," $2,720,570.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator in charge of the bill the reason for striking out the provision beginning with line 19 on page 46.

Mr. PHIPPS. That is the item regarding which the Senator spoke to me. The assistant property clerk, as our committee is informed, performs no police duty. He does not make arrests. He does not take his life in his hands, so to speak, but keeps accounts. He is drawing a salary of $1,500 a year. To name him as sergeant on the police force would give him an increase of $900 a year, promoting him over men on the force who have served for years and whose ambition it is to be named as sergeants.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to say to the Senator and to the Senate, in regard to this particular matter, that this follows a precedent which has already been established by the Congress. Take the case of the present chief of police, Mr. Hesse. He was chief clerk in the department and was promoted to assistant chief of the police force only last year, or year before last. This case is in exact consonance with that.

So far as this particular clerk is concerned, he is drawing the highest salary he can receive in the department. His salary can run to $1,500 a year and no more. He has been in the service for 11 years, is an excellent officer, has made a fine record, is a fine accountant, and there is no reason why he should not be promoted. He is a man who had two sons in the late war; he is an excellent citizen in every respect and an excellent officer. I hope the Senator will be willing that the amendment of the committee may be disagreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. There is an additional objection—I did not suppose that was the only one—and that is the virtual naming of the present clerk. I would suggest to the Senator having the bill in charge that if the item be left in, it provide for an assistant clerk instead of naming the man who is there now, as the clause practically does.

Mr. McKELLAR. I would be perfectly willing to accept that amendment.

Mr. PHIPPS. Your committee had no testimony or evidence before it which would justify it in approving this item. Therefore the committee thought the wise thing to do was to strike it out, to take it to conference, and to give the House an opportunity to show what information it might have other than that disclosed in its hearings. We were unable to have the commissioner in charge of this department say that it was a wise move. He would not say that it was a wise and proper thing to do, and the committee was not approached by representatives of the police department in the interest of the item. We felt that under the circumstances the proper thing to do was to strike it out in the Senate and take it to conference for further consideration. I would not feel inclined to have the amendment rejected on the floor, because that would mean that the provision would be the law; but I am perfectly willing to give it all fair consideration in conference.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will accept the suggestion made by the Senator from Kansas it will have the same effect, because it would raise the whole question as to this man. But I want to call the Senator's attention and the committee's attention to the evidence, and the only evidence, on which this change was made. It was made upon the testimony of Commissioner Fenning, and Commissioner Fenning appeared before the committee, as appears on page 44 of the Senate hearings, to have this identical thing done in the case of another man. He presented a memorandum relating to the present chief clerk of the fire department, whom it was sought to have appointed a battalion chief of the fire department of the District of Columbia. Then Commissioner Fenning went on to say:

I want to say in that connection that that language was not put in by the commissioners. The commissioners had no knowledge of it. It was put in by the House. I should like to file a memorandum in support of its staying in the bill, however. This memorandum shows that the present chief clerk of the department has been in that position for a number of years; that he has been in the fire department since 1912; that his duties are principally to act as assistant to the chief engineer in the administrative work of the department.

Mr. PHIPPS. That refers to the fire department, not the police department.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is identically the same in principle. Here he is pleading, giving all the reasons for the case in the fire department which might be given for the case in the police department.

I also want to call the attention of the Senator and the Senate further to the fact that Mr. Fenning did not bring this particular matter up at all. This was what occurred:

Commissioner FENNING. * * * It is the same language—to which I have raised no objection, although the commissioners had no part in its being in the bill—that appears on page 45 of the present bill with respect to an employee of the police department.

Senator KENDRICK. Is there not some opposition to that change?

Commissioner FENNING. Do you mean in the police department?

Senator KENDRICK. Yes; the change in rank, if you may call it that, of the assistant chief clerk. That is who it is, is it not?

Commissioner FENNING. The assistant property clerk, who is a civilian, on page 45 of the bill, which remained in the bill as it went through the House, but which was not put in at the suggestion of the commissioners. It is proposed that that man be appointed a sergeant of the Metropolitan police force.

Senator PHIPPS. What effect would that have on his compensation?

Commissioner FENNING. I think his present salary is something like $1,680 (later corrected to $1,500) as a clerk. A sergeant gets $2,400, and is entitled to retirement at half pay, and is entitled to the general privileges of membership in the police department. That provision was put in by the House of Representatives. I am saying nothing for or against it.

Senator PHIPPS. But you should say something for or against it. That is what you are here for, to say whether or not that is a proper thing. Why should this man, who is a civilian employee and never in position to be called on to make an arrest or to perform the duties of a policeman, be designated as a sergeant of the police force? He is a clerk in the office.

Commissioner FENNING. I should be very glad to give my opinion on that subject, Senator PHIPPS.

Senator PHIPPS. Yes; that is what we want to know.

Commissioner FENNING. I did not do so out of courtesy to the House, which put it in. I presumed it was a matter that was being attended to here at the Capitol. I should say, as the commissioner in charge of the police department, that I see no reason why a person occupying such a position should be a member of the uniformed police force.

Senator KENDRICK. Would it not actually have an effect upon the morale of the police force?

Senator PHIPPS. It seems to me it would.

Commissioner FENNING. It might, very readily. It came as a surprise to the commissioners. I did not know it was going to be in the bill.

Senator PHIPPS. Does the same thing apply to the chief clerk in the fire department?

Commissioner FENNING. I do not think it does, for reasons which I will state.

It is exactly the same principle. Evidently the commissioner did not want to make that statement, but it seems that the Senator from Colorado rather urged him to give his opinion about it.

Here is a chief of police who was promoted in exactly the same way. He makes no recommendation about it. But the commissioner, at the urgent solicitation of the Senator from Colorado, did make the statement I have read. It seems to me it is reasonable and proper that this promotion should be made, and I hope the Senator will agree that the amendment may not be agreed to.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, in the case to which the Senator has referred, of this assistant property clerk, the committee was not approached by anyone to advocate the case. He has read the testimony and the only testimony we had that is printed.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is all I can find.

Mr. PHIPPS. In the case of the fire department, the fire chief came to me personally, hearing about this after the hearings had closed, and most strongly recommended the designating of their man as a fire marshal, giving as his reasons the fact that the man must respond to fire alarms after the first call; that he must remain on duty; must go and give orders when the chief is not there; and when the department has all been ordered out he must go to the place of the fire and confer with the chief, and take his orders in person there. So that that man is in actual control of the fire-engine employees when they are on duty, and must direct their going to fires.

Mr. McKELLAR. The same principle applies to this man.

Mr. PHIPPS. I do not think the Senator should ask that the item be restored. I think he should be satisfied with the statement that the conferees will be willing to give this matter every fair consideration in conference.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is a part of it, but I want to go a little further and ask the Senator, in order that it may remain in conference, to accept the suggestion made by the Senator from Kansas, which would put it in, in reality, because under the amendment of the Senator from Kansas the appointment of this particular man would not be required at all. I ask the Senator to let that be agreed to.

Mr. PHIPPS. It would make the assistant property clerk, whoever he may be, a sergeant.

Mr. McKELLAR. It would be on exactly the same grounds the Senator has given in the case of the fire chief.

Mr. PHIPPS. I can not see the necessity for paying an assistant property clerk $2,400 a year. I would not do it in my own business, and I do not believe the Senator would do it in his business.

Mr. McKELLAR. If he were a competent and efficient man, I would give him a reasonable salary, and I would just as soon do it this way as in any other way. I think this is the better way, and I think this man is a good and competent man.

Mr. PHIPPS. He may be; that we are perfectly willing to find out; but we had no backing up of this recommendation from anyone representing the police department. Chief Hesse did not come. He has made no communication on the subject.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, it is very natural that the chief did not come. He was probably satisfied with it. He had been along exactly the same route before, and it is very natural to assume that he was entirely satisfied with it. I hope the Senator will let it go in.

Mr. PHIPPS. I want again to call the Senator's attention to the statement of Commissioner Fenning in the report of the testimony that the commissioners did not recommend or put either of those items in the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is true; but whenever we get to legislating solely and alone in accordance with what the commissioners recommend there will be no use for the Congress at all; we might just as well turn it all over to them.

Mr. PHIPPS. Not at all; I do not agree with the Senator on that point. But I do say that when the bill goes to conference we shall give very full consideration to the proposition.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will ask the Senator this—

Mr. PHIPPS. I do not think the amendment suggested by the Senator from Kansas should be substituted, because I do not believe it would give the Senate conferees a full chance to thrash it out with the conferees on the part of the House.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will ask this: Of course, the Senator from Colorado will be on the conference committee. Would he object to my coming before the committee when the matter is before it?

Mr. PHIPPS. If the House conferees do not object, certainly not. Of course, the Senator knows the rules we usually try to observe with reference to conferences.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am quite sure the House conferees will not object, and I would like very much to appear there with a statement of all the facts, so that the matter can be thrashed out.

Mr. PHIPPS. I will be obliged to the Senator if he will produce a statement of the facts, because I confess that no such statement was presented to the committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thank the Senator very much, and will be glad to let it take that course.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 48, line 8, after the numerals "1928," to strike out the colon and the following proviso: "Provided, That the purchase price of the site shall not exceed the full value assessment last made before purchase thereof plus 25 per cent thereof," so as to read:

For the purchase of a site and the erection of a building to be known as the fourteenth police precinct station house to replace the subpolice station at Tenleytown, D. C., $60,000, to be available immediately and to remain available until July 1, 1928.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Fire department, miscellaneous," on page 50, line 12, after the word "items," to strike out "cost of installation and maintenance of telephones in the residences of the superintendent of machinery and the fire marshal," so as to make the paragraph read:

For contingent expenses, horsehoeing, furniture, fixtures, oil, medical and stable supplies, harness, blacksmithing, gas and electric lighting, flags and balyards, and other necessary items, $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 50, after line 17, to insert:

For traveling and other expenses of a committee to be appointed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to consider and report upon the installation of a high-pressure water system in the congested high-value section of the District of Columbia, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 51, line 14, after the numerals "1928," to strike out the following proviso: "Provided, That the purchase price of the site shall not exceed the full-value assessment last made before purchase thereof plus 25 per cent thereof," so as to read:

For house, site, furniture, and furnishings for an engine company to be located in the vicinity of Sixteenth Street and Piney Branch Road NW., including the cost of necessary instruments for receiving alarms and connecting said house with fire-alarm headquarters, $92,525, to be available immediately and to remain available until July 1, 1928.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Police court," on page 58, at the end of line 6, to strike out "$84,270" and insert "$84,570," so as to read:

Salaries: For personal services in accordance with the classification act of 1923, including $300 additional for presiding judge, $84,570.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 62, line 11, after the word "law," to insert "and expenses of commitments to the District Training School," so as to make the paragraph read:

For expenses attending the execution of writs de lunatico inquirendo and commitments thereunder in all cases of indigent insane persons committed or sought to be committed to St. Elizabetha Hospital by order of the executive authority of the District of Columbia under the provisions of existing law, and expenses of commitments to the District Training School, including personal services, $8,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 63, to strike out the heading "Charities and Corrections" and insert "Public Welfare," and, in line 3, to strike out "Board of Charities" and insert "Board of Public Welfare."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 63, line 5, to increase the appropriation for personal services, Board of Public Welfare, in accordance with the classification act of 1923, from $32,000 to $75,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 63, after line 5, to insert:

DIVISION OF CHILD WELFARE

Administration: For administrative expenses, including placing and visiting children, city directory, purchase of books of reference and periodicals not exceeding $50, and all office and sundry expenses, $5,000; and no part of the moneys herein appropriated shall be used for the purpose of visiting any ward of the Board of Public Welfare placed outside the District of Columbia and the States of Virginia and Maryland, and a ward placed outside said District and the States of Virginia and Maryland shall be visited not less than once a year by a voluntary agent or correspondent of said board, and that said board shall have power, upon proper showing, in its discretion, to discharge from guardianship any child committed to its care.

For maintenance of feeble-minded children (white and colored), $37,500.

The disbursing officer of the District of Columbia is authorized to advance to the Director of Public Welfare, upon requisitions previously approved by the auditor of the District of Columbia and upon such security as may be required of said director by the commissioners, sums of money not to exceed $400 at any one time, to be used for expenses in placing and visiting children, traveling on official business of the board, and for office and sundry expenses, all such expenditures to be accounted for to the accounting officers of the District of Columbia within one month on itemized vouchers properly approved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "National Training School for Boys," on page 66, line 19, before the word "with," to strike out "Charities" and insert "Public Welfare," so as to read:

For care and maintenance of boys committed to the National Training School for Boys by the courts of the District of Columbia under a contract to be made by the Board of Public Welfare with the authorities of said National Training School for Boys, $46,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Medical charities," on page 67, at the end of line 15, to strike out "Charities" and insert "Public Welfare," so as to read:

For care and treatment of indigent patients under contracts to be made by the Board of Public Welfare with the following institutions and for not to exceed the following amounts, respectively:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 67, at the end of line 26, to reduce the appropriation for care and treatment of indigent patients, Washington Home for Incurables, from $10,000 to $5,000.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I am very much interested in the amendment just stated. I observe that the amount provided for by the House was $10,000 and that the Senate committee proposes to cut it down to $5,000.

I had occasion to visit this institution several weeks ago. I went all through it. I examined the whole plant. I think I saw every patient in the institution. I think it is one of the most deserving charities in Washington. It is a home for incurables. There is no one there who is an addict to the use of alcohol or drugs, or anything of that kind. It is a home for paralytics, a home for those who suffer from cancer and who have been diagnosed as incurable. They have taken into that institution some of the most pitiful cases I have ever seen. It is a difficult charity. It is a difficult kind of patient to attend to. The testimony of Mrs. Hopkins is set out at page 931 of the hearings before the House committee. I do not know whether the members of the Senate committee read those hearings or not.

The institution has 90 patients. It costs $15,000 a year to look after those 90 patients. They have one of the most magnificent homes in Washington, a very large building comfortably arranged for those paralytics and others who suffer in a similar way. There is no aid asked of the Government at all in the way of paying interest on depreciation or rent, or any charge for this enormous building that has been put up by some of the people in this town to look after a peculiar character of patients. In most hospitals the patient goes in and comes out either dead or alive in a short time. This institution must be maintained during the life of the patient. It has been in existence since 1904, due largely to the charity of Mrs. Hopkins and some other ladies in Washington.

The actual cost to those ladies who have undertaken this charity is $15,000 a year, without considering the investment in that large building or interest on their money or depreciation. It certainly seems to me, considering the character of the institution, that they should be helped to take care of it. It would be a calamity, indeed, for those 90 patients there, old women who are poverty-stricken, paralytics who can not move but who must stay there until they die, if through any chance the home should become bankrupt or should be abandoned.

It seems to me in a case of this kind the least the Congress of the United States could do on behalf of the people of the District is to give them a modest aid in the sum of $10,000 a year toward the support of those 90 patients, when nothing is asked for this enormous, fine plant. Even such an amount will not care for more than two-thirds of the actual outlay for food and care. I hope the Senate will not reduce that amount in that way.

Mr. PHIPPS. The committee found that for the current fiscal year the amount set aside for the institution was $5,000. The $10,000 was, of course, an increase. Up to March 31, inclusive, out of the $5,000 for this year's allowance $3,743 had been spent. The rate per week is not only moderate but it is entirely too low, in my judgment. From a report of the institution which I asked for when I was solicited to do something or other in the way of extending some personal aid, I was very much disappointed to find that the work was being carried on upon such an expensive plant; that is to say, the comparison of overhead with the number of patients cared for.

It is a new home, as I understand it, on Wisconsin Avenue, which is a fine piece of property and a substantial appearing building. I have not as yet had an opportunity to visit it, but I have examined the report for the latest year it was available, and it seemed to me that the overhead was entirely too large for the number of people cared for and that the total cost per patient per year was greater than it should be. I do not see how the institution can make the rate it does to the city for the care of patients that it takes over at the instance of the Board of Public Welfare.

I will say to the Senator that there is not only this case but two or three other hospitals where the House has made changes, departing from this year's allowance and the Budget estimate, which we have changed. In the two items immediately following we have made a change, one for the Georgetown University Hospital, an increase of $3,000 over last year made by the House, which we put back to this year's figure, and the George Washington University Hospital we treated in the same way. If we had the additional patients to be cared for and needed the additional money for that purpose, it would be a different proposition. The rate, as I said, is abnormally low, but from the experience of the past it does not seem necessary to increase the amount over the present fiscal year's allowance of $5,000.

Mr. PITTMAN. Here is what Mrs. Hopkins said.

Mr. PHIPPS. May I inquire to what page the Senator is referring?

Mr. PITTMAN. Page 931 of the House Committee hearings. This is what she said:

Then, we have patients from six foreign countries, or from seven foreign countries, if you call Canada a foreign country, as follows: Canada, Germany, England, Ireland, Hungary, and Russia. There is a total of 144 people in the home. Fifty-three of them are salaried. There are 90 patients, 4 on the staff, 22 nurses, 4 orderlies, 24 servants, and 3 engineers. As I said, there are 53 salaries paid. To feed, warm, light, and nurse these patients costs us about $5,000 per month. We fed them from November 1, 1924, to November 1, 1925, for 38 cents per diem per capita. I do not think that any of you did better than that in your own homes. For everything, all the expenses, including the $25,000 for salaries, and many other items, the cost was $1.20 per diem per capita. There is no income or charge for the building; $1.20 per day for 35 free patients means $42 per day, and for the year it would amount to $15,330. Congress gives us $5,000. Therefore, we have a yearly deficit of $10,330. I came up to see Mr. MADDEN the other day, and he asked me what I wanted. I told him I wanted two things. I told him that one of the things I wanted was $10,000. Then one of my committee told me what an awful blunder I had made, because our deficit is more than $10,000. There is a difference of $10,330. I said that another thing I wanted was to get whatever we received direct. You give that to us through the Board of Charities, and they never give us the full appropriation. One year they took off $600 and covered it back into the Treasury. Of course, that makes them look very well indeed from the standpoint of economy, but you do not know how they pinch it out of us.

The Board of Charities makes a deduction of a few dollars, two or three dollars, whenever a woman or a man is gone, and that is not fair. I think that when you give me $5,000 you mean that we should have it. We need it for the expenses of the household. The room that has been occupied must be kept up. The room must be kept until the patient comes back. In looking back over the report for 35 years, we find that we have always had difficulty with the Board of Charities. There is always some delay. It is always one month late and frequently it is three months late. Now, why can we not have that money direct?

There is the situation. If they were here asking that the Government of the United States support the charity, then the question as to whether or not the overhead could be reduced would be a very material consideration for Congress. But they are not doing that. They have a plant out there that probably cost $300,000 or $400,000. It is not like a hospital. The rooms are not little rooms with a cot in each one. They are great big airy rooms out in the woods. Those incurables are not looked after like the ordinary patient who has a broken leg or something of that sort, where the nurse comes in once or twice a day to take his temperature.

These patients are in a condition where they require constant nursing morning, noon, and night. Most of them are helpless. Part of them can not move any more than a finger. There must be a lot of nursing for that kind of people. They have to have good air. They are there until they die. Some of them have been there for 30 years slowly dying and wholly helpless.

It can not be compared to another kind of hospital. There is not any better charity anywhere than is displayed in the care of these old men and women who are poverty-stricken, without relatives, absolutely helpless, many of whom can not move themselves at all, but have to be turned by a nurse, some of whom have to be lifted up in regular trusses and moved around in that way. Of course they have to have 22 nurses for those 90 patients. As a matter of fact, if it were possible, each one of them should have a nurse night and day.

These people are doing the very best they can. They could cut the building in two and make four rooms out of what is now one room and have one window where they now have two windows. They could cut down expenses for these 90 old men and women who are helpless, but whose minds are just as keen to-day as ever. They could cut down to $5,000 a year; but when the women in charge of the institution are contributing the interest on an investment of between $300,000 and $500,000 and are taking care of the overhead over and above the $10,000, it seems to me that it is a hard thing, to say the least, to talk about overhead expenses.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. As to the cost of it, I call the attention of the Senate to Mrs. Hopkins's statement, as follows:

Mrs. HOPKINS. Yes, sir; and we raised the money for it ourselves. I am glad that other people get assistance. I understand that when Providence Hospital was built they were given $200,000; but we raised this money. We raised every penny of it ourselves. The cost of the new building and grounds was $516,610.27; the cost of the new equipment was $16,038.31; the balance left on hand was $193, making a total of $532,841.58.

It seems to me that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] is exactly right. If the Congress makes any mistake in the world, it ought to be made on the side of these poor, helpless, defenseless people. I hope the chairman of the committee will agree to let the amendment be rejected, as has been suggested by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not know what the value of the building is because I did not see the testimony, but I do know that it is a magnificent building, and I estimated roughly its value as being between $300,000 and half a million dollars. I think the members of the committee ought to go out and look at that building and acquaint themselves with the work being done there. As I said before, it is not like the emergency hospital; it is not a "joint" into which they throw somebody into as narrow a place as can be done with as little care as possible. Those who erected that building erected it in order to try to make as comfortable as possible the poor helpless people who possibly have to spend 30 or 40 years or the remainder of their lives without moving. They are not asking for very much help; they are not asking for any interest on the half million dollars invested; they are not asking for any rent; they are not even asking for the total amount of actual expenses incurred; they are asking for but $10,000, when the actual cost of feeding these people is about $15,000. I repeat, I wish members of the committee could have gone out and looked at the building as I did.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, the committee based its conclusion in this case upon the best evidence that it could readily obtain. It had the House hearings. It did not call a representative of the institution to appear before it. I have given the Senate my personal statement as to the matter. I asked for a report of their proceedings and as to what they were doing, because I have been personally solicited in reference to the matter. As the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar] has stated, there has been an investment of about $506,000; the report which I had showed an investment of $531,000, but it also showed that out of the annual appropriation of $5,000 they had only used $4,300.

They fix the per diem at a weekly rate for the patients there. I am perfectly willing to admit that it is too low. If they can feed the patients for 38 cents a day, they are not giving them as much good food as perhaps they should.

Mr. PITTMAN. I agree with the Senator as to that.

Mr. PHIPPS. Perhaps the patients do not need very much and that may be the reason why the per diem rate is fixed as it is. However, as it is recommended so strongly, I shall not offer any objection to the amendment being voted down.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is rejected.

Mr. PITTMAN. I thank the Senator.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 68, at the end of line 1, to reduce the appropriation for care and treatment of indigent patients, Georgetown University Hospital, from $8,000 to $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 68, at the end of line 2, to reduce the appropriation for care and treatment of indigent patients, George Washington University Hospital, from $8,000 to $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 68, line 21, to strike out the heading "Gallinger Municipal Hospital" and insert "Gallinger Municipal Hospital."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, commencing at the top of page 70, to strike out:

CHILD CARING INSTITUTIONS

BOARD OF CHILDREN'S GUARDIANS

Administration: For administrative expenses, including placing and visiting children, city directory, purchase of books of reference and periodicals not exceeding $50, and all office and sundry expenses, $5,000; and no part of the moneys herein appropriated shall be used for the purpose of visiting any ward of the Board of Children's Guardians placed outside the District of Columbia and the States of Virginia and Maryland, and a ward placed outside said District and the States of Virginia and Maryland shall be visited not less than once a year by a voluntary agent or correspondent of said board, and that said board shall have power, upon proper showing, in its discretion, to discharge from guardianship any child committed to its care.

Salaries: For personal services in accordance with the classification act of 1923, $53,080.

For maintenance of feeble-minded children (white and colored), $37,500.

For board and care of all children committed to the guardianship of said board by the courts of the District, and for temporary care of children pending investigation or while being transferred from place to place, with authority to pay not more than $1,500 each to institutions under sectarian control and not more than $400 for burial of children dying while under charge of the board, $120,000.

The disbursing officer of the District of Columbia is authorized to advance to the agent of the Board of Children's Guardians, upon requisitions previously approved by the auditor of the District of Columbia and upon such security as may be required of said agent by the commissioners, sums of money not to exceed $400 at any one time, to be used for expenses in placing and visiting children, traveling on official business of the board, and for office and sundry expenses, all such expenditures to be accounted for to the accounting officers of the District of Columbia within one month on itemized vouchers properly approved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 73, line 22, to strike out the heading "Miscellaneous."

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Southern Relief Society," on page 74, line 21, after the word "of" to strike out "Charities, $10,000" and insert "Public Welfare, $5,000," so as to read:

For care and maintenance of needy and infirm Confederate veterans, their widows and dependents, residents in the District of Columbia, under a contract to be made with the Southern Relief Society by the Board of Public Welfare, $5,000.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, with respect to this item were I to consult my own feeling I would not have a word to say, but being a member of the Senate Appropriations Committee and also of the Committee on the District of Columbia I was relied on by the worthy people who desire this money for the purpose indicated to look after the item. I was not present at the meeting of the committee at which the sum proposed to be appropriated by the House of Representatives was reduced by the Senate committee. It is a trivial amount, and for the last 10 years, with the exception of two years, it invariably has been $10,000. Evidently the House thought it ought to continue at $10,000, and I hope the Senate may reject the proposed committee amendment.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, the Senate committee was following the suggestion of the Budget Bureau, which had approved an appropriation of $5,000; but this is also a charitable institution, and I shall not object to having the amendment rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is rejected.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, on page 74 I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 74, line 21, it is proposed to strike out the word "Charities" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "Public Welfare."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 75, after line 2, to strike out:

COLUMBIA POLYTECHNIC INSTITUTE

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Water service," on page 83, line 9, after the word "department," to insert "to the full amount of these revenues, and any deficit therein is hereby appropriated for out of the combined revenues of the District of Columbia," so as to read:

The following sums are appropriated wholly out of the revenues of the water department for expenses of the Washington Aqueduct and its appurtenances and for expenses of water department to the full amount of these revenues, and any deficit therein is hereby appropriated for out of the combined revenues of the District of Columbia, namely:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 85, line 7, before the word "respectively," to strike out "$3" and insert "$1.50," so as to make the paragraph read:

The rates of assessment for laying or constructing water mains and service sewers in the District of Columbia under the provisions of the act entitled "An act authorizing the laying of water mains and service sewers in the District of Columbia, the levying of assessments therefor, and for other purposes," approved April 22, 1904, are hereby increased from $1.25 to $2 and $1 to $1.50, respectively, per linear front foot for any water mains and service sewers constructed or laid during the fiscal year 1927.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 85, after line 9, to strike out:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 86, line 17, after the word "reservoir," to strike out "embracing lots 1 to 9, inclusive, square 1762; 9 to 16, inclusive, square 1763; 25 to 32, inclusive, square 1766; 19 to 27, inclusive, square 1845, $25,000, and the commissioners are hereby authorized to close all highways abutting on any or all of the above-mentioned lots: Provided, That the purchase price of the site shall not exceed the latest full value assessment thereof plus 25 per cent," and insert "$50,000, and the commissioners are hereby authorized to close, where necessary, all highways that may interfere with the development of the proposed project," so as to make the paragraph read:

For purchase or condemnation of site for new third high service reservoir, $50,000, and the commissioners are hereby authorized to close, where necessary, all highways that may interfere with the development of the proposed project.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 87, line 19, after the numerals "1927," to strike out the colon and the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That no person shall be employed in pursuance of the authority contained in this section for a longer period than six months in the aggregate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 90, after line 19, to insert:

That any person employed under any of the provisions of this act who has been employed for 10 consecutive months or more, shall not be denied the leave of absence with pay for which the law provides: Provided, That estimates of appropriations for the District of Columbia shall include provision for those positions which have been filled continuously for 12 consecutive months or more as regular and not temporary employments, if, in the judgment of the commissioners, such employments will be filled throughout the fiscal year for which the estimates are submitted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, the committee has authorized me to present several amendments. I send them to the desk and ask that they may be considered in their order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado on behalf of the committee will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 8, after the word "appropriated," it is proposed to insert "to be advanced July 1, 1926."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 26, after line 13, it is proposed to insert a new paragraph, as follows:

In addition to the provision of existing law requiring contractors to keep new pavements in repair for a period of one year from the date of the completion of the work, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall further require that where repairs are necessary during the four years following the said one-year period, due to inferior work or defective materials, such repairs shall be made at the expense of the contractor, and the bond furnished by the contractor shall be liable for such expense.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 32, line 25, after the numerals "$750,000," it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That this appropriation shall not be available for the payment of rates for electric street lighting in excess of 87½ per cent of rates heretofore established by law, and rates established by the commissioners in accordance with law, and payment for electric current for new forms of street lighting shall not exceed 2 cents per kilowatt-hour for current consumed.

Mr. McKELLAR. I inquire what will be the effect of that amendment, Mr. President.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, the reason for that amendment is this: Some years ago the rates to be paid by the city for electric lighting of the streets were fixed by law. Of course, they were based on the candlepower capacity of the various lamps. At that time the consumption of electricity, we will say, of a 40-candlepower lamp, was greater than the consumption is to-day with the newer methods and new lamps having a different filament, of tungsten or other element, that is used instead of the old wire. In the meantime the citizens, by award of the court, have been given a rebate on the rates which they were paying for electricity, and we felt that a reduction of 12½ per cent at this time in current rates was none too much to ask for. Following that, we are asking the legislative committee on the District of Columbia to take cognizance of the present rates, and, if the rates are to be fixed by legislation, then let us have a readjustment of the present rates.

Mr. McKELLAR. The amendment means a reduction for the city?

Mr. PHIPPS. It means a reduction for the city. Of course, the city has had a reduction in the lamps in use in its buildings, those that are under meter service, the same as have the citizens, but the street lights are on a flat basis.

Mr. McKELLAR. The amendment puts them on the same basis?

Mr. PHIPPS. It does not put them on exactly the same basis, but it makes the rates more comparable.

Mr. McKELLAR. At all events, it is a reduction?

Mr. PHIPPS. It is a reduction of 12½ per cent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 40, after line 8, it is proposed to insert a new paragraph, as follows:

The children of officers and men of the United States Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, and children of other employees of the United States stationed outside the District of Columbia shall be admitted to the public schools without payment of tuition.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 49, line 16, it is proposed to strike out "Columbia, $1,825,430," and in lieu thereof to insert: Columbia," including the present chief clerk of the fire department, who shall be appointed a battalion chief engineer in the fire department of the District of Columbia and shall act as ex officio chief clerk, $1,828,680.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is the matter to which we referred a while ago?

Mr. PHIPPS. That relates to the question which was discussed a few moments ago. We desire to take the amendment to conference to inquire into it assiduously as we will into the others.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 49, line 18, it is proposed to strike out "$7,080," and insert in lieu thereof "$3,780."

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 80, line 16, after the numerals "$15,000," it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided further, That not to exceed $5,000 may be expended by contract or otherwise for architectural or other professional services without reference to the classification act of 1923 or civil-service rules, as approved by the director, in the development of Meridian Hill Park.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 92, after line 4, it is proposed to insert as a separate paragraph the following:

SEC. 7. That in disbursing funds appropriated for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia the commissioners of said District shall require such form of receipt as evidence of payment as may be deemed sufficient in the opinion of the corporation counsel of said District to give full legal acquittance to the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PHIPPS. That completes the committee amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Colorado if there is any more money appropriated this year for medical school inspection than last year?

Mr. PHIPPS. My recollection is that there is an increase, and that we accepted the House action with reference to it; but I will inform the Senator in just a moment.

I find that the increase amounts to only $2,800.

Mr. COPELAND. On what page is it?

Mr. PHIPPS. That is on page 54, line 9.

Mr. COPELAND. Is the appropriation stated here the same as that of last year?

Mr. PHIPPS. No; there is an increase of $2,800. Last year it was $63,000.

Mr. SMOOT. The wording, however, is exactly the same.

Mr. PHIPPS. The wording is identical.

Mr. COPELAND. Does the Senator think that is the best that can be done this year?

Mr. PHIPPS. I think it is. There is no Budget estimate for any larger amount.

Mr. COPELAND. I never want the Senator from Utah to be against any matter of this sort—

Mr. PHIPPS. He never is unless he is right.

Mr. COPELAND. But my feeling about it is that we ought to be more liberal in the appropriations for the prevention of disease. There are certain mandatory things that we must do when we have the hospitals and the insane and the feeble-minded—

Mr. SMOOT. That is why we gave the increase.

Mr. COPELAND. But the money that is used in this way means the prevention of disease, and it means that there will be fewer appropriations and less money appropriations in the future for these institutions which are mandatory.

Mr. SMOOT. Never less, but in a better way.

Mr. PHIPPS. Never less. I wish to say to the Senator from New York that the committee did discuss this question of hygiene in the schools, and dwelt particularly—at least, I did—upon the importance of having the children's eyes examined. That to my mind is really more important and more necessary than to see that they brush their teeth every day.

Mr. COPELAND. Will the Senator assure me that the committee has gone just as far as it can go this year?

Mr. PHIPPS. It is unfortunately not possible for the committee to go any further this year.

Mr. COPELAND. I hope that next year the committee may take another step, because I have no doubt that appropriations of this sort make for the prevention of appropriations in the future.

Mr. PHIPPS. I agree with the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

AMENDMENT OF TRADING WITH THE ENEMY ACT

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the message from the House of Representatives, returning to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the message from the Senate announcing its agreement to the conference report on the bill (S. 1226) to amend the trading with the enemy act.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the vote whereby the Senate agreed to the conference report be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. BINGHAM. I now ask unanimous consent that the report be recommitted to the conference committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 6559, for the construction of certain public buildings, and for other purposes.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will ask the Senator if he intends to proceed with the bill this afternoon.

Mr. FERNALD. No; not to-night.

Mr. CURTIS. It is merely desired to lay it before the Senate?

Mr. FERNALD. Merely to lay it before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, the Senator does not intend to go on with the bill to-night?

Mr. FERNALD. No; not to-night.

Mr. MOSES. I desire to know from the chairman of the committee just exactly what he proposes. The unfinished business before the Senate is the Italian debt settlement.

Mr. FERNALD. It is not desired to make this bill the unfinished business.

Mr. MOSES. Then what is the request?

Mr. FERNALD. Just to lay the bill before the Senate for consideration.

Mr. MOSES. In other words, the Senator asks unanimous consent to lay aside the unfinished business temporarily for the purpose of taking up this bill?

Mr. SMOOT. It has been temporarily laid aside.

Mr. FERNALD. It has already been laid aside.

Mr. CURTIS. As I understand, the Senator desires to have the bill laid before the Senate to-night, so that there will be notice to the Senate that he will ask to go on with it to-morrow in case no Senator desires to discuss the Italian debt settlement.

Mr. MOSES. And the purpose is to take a recess to-night?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maine?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6559) for the construction of certain public buildings, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments.

SPECIAL ASSISTANT CLERK TO INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMITTEE

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of Senate Resolution 124, Order of Business 407, authorizing the Committee on Interstate Commerce to employ a special assistant clerk.

Mr. CURTIS and Mr. SMOOT. Let it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

Mr. GOODING. I will state that there is an amendment to the resolution.

The CHIEF CLERK. The committee proposes to strike out all after the resolving clause and to insert:

That the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate is hereby authorized to employ a special clerk during the remainder of the Sixty-ninth Congress, who shall be a rate expert, skilled in matters relating to railroad transportation, and shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate at the rate of $7,000 per annum.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, the Committee on Interstate Commerce now asks that that amendment be rejected, and that the chairman of the committee be allowed to employ a special clerk at $2,500 per annum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. MOSES. May we have the original resolution read? Is the employment to be for the rest of the Sixty-ninth Congress or permanently?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The original resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate hereby is authorized to employ a special assistant clerk during the remainder of the Sixty-ninth Congress, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate at the rate of $2,500 per annum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

ADDRESS BY HON. ROBERT L. OWEN ON CAUSES OF THE WORLD WAR

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I hold in my hand an informative, illuminating, and interesting address by a former Member of this body, ex-Senator Robert L. Owen. I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The address is as follows:

An address by Hon. Robert L. Owen at Copley-Plaza, Boston, March 27, 1926, before the Foreign Policy Association relative to the more recent evidences as to the causes of the World War, Manley O. Hudson, professor of international law, Harvard Law School, presiding

Ladies and gentlemen, the presence here to-day of so many professors of history and of law and of so many others known to be scholars and learned in recent history gives me special satisfaction and courage, as it will afford you the chance of challenging any historical fact of which you may have doubt and give me the coveted opportunity of reply.

When the United States entered the World War in 1917 it was on the ground that the Imperial Government of Germany had persisted in making war on the United States. The officials of Great Britain and France by skillful publicity had persuaded the public opinion of America that the German people were dominated by an imperial military machine, had long prepared for war, had suddenly launched the war with the intention of first conquering Europe and then dictating to the United States and to the world, and that the success of the German military dynasty meant a grave danger to all democratic governments.

The vast disclosures of dependable official evidence since the war and the many recent works of historians (a portion of which is in a printed list before you—"Exhibit A") have gradually made a change in the opinions of informed men throughout the world. Whatever the causes of the World War, the fall of the military dynasties of the Romanoffs, Hohenzollerns, and Hapsburgs, etc., has advanced the cause of democratic governments and given a fairer prospect of world peace and prosperity. We must know the causes in order to prevent like causes bringing about a recurrence of war.

The causes of the World War may be said now to be thoroughly well understood and known by the scholars of the world. They are not so well known to the great mass of mankind, who have been misled by propaganda and are now kept in the dark by the silence of the press, which for stupid consistency's sake seems averse to giving full publicity to newly discovered truth.

The soil in which this monstrous war was born was excess nationalism (chauvinism) diligently taught by self-serving leaders, who thus sought to demonstrate their own patriotism and right of leadership. The vanity and patriotism of the mass of the population led them to the acceptance of such false doctrines.

Chauvinism led to militarism. It established the theory of "preparedness for war," and nearly all the leaders of Europe advocated preparing for war to the extent of their taxing capacity. They thus engendered fear of each other and pride of conquest. Commercialism and militarism gave birth to imperialism. The British leaders had extended the British Empire by conquest to every part of the world. Other nations followed suit, and imperialism became the order of the day. The German leaders were somewhat slow in demanding their "place in the sun," but finally demanded it and energetically began the building of a great navy. They thus excited the fear of leading British statesmen as dangerous competitors on the sea and in commerce and disturbed French ambitions to rule northern Africa. Germany supporting Turkey was in Russia's way on the Dardanelles and in the Balkans.

Out of chauvinism, militarism, imperialism, out of the desire for commercial expansion, out of ambition, fear, and vanity, grew the intrigues which led gradually to the planning and execution of the Great War, through secret diplomacy and a subsidized press.

In speaking to this audience one may be sure that they are more or less familiar with the evidence.

On December 18, 1923, I submitted to the United States Senate certain evidence, with exhibits and references, in which abundant proof appears. Recent evidence fully confirms the truth of what was then presented. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

The most important of all these official secret records is Un Livre Noir (Rene Marchand) and Entente Diplomacy and the World (DeSlebert). These two books contain nearly 2,000 secret dispatches passing between the Russian Foreign Office between Sazonoff and his associates and the Russian ambassador at Paris, Izvolski, and the Russian ambassador, Benckendorf, at London. These records disclose the secret diplomacy of the officials in charge of the Foreign Offices of Russia, France, and Great Britain, and these dispatches clearly demonstrate that the officials in charge of the Russian Foreign Office had definitely made up their minds that Russia could only carry out what they called Russia's "historic mission" by a general European war.

Russia's historic mission, according to their view, was the control of the Dardanelles and free access to the Mediterranean (a reasonable aspiration), hegemony of the Balkan States, etc.

The Russian statesmen had been defeated in this ambition as to the Dardanelles by the British Foreign Office and its allies. Great Britain feared that Russia might be a dangerous competitor for the control of India, and the British statesmen were not willing to see Russian power expand where the Suez Canal might be blocked.

When the Russian statesmen determined that a World War was necessary to "Russia's historic mission," they deliberately planned to bring it about. The first thing necessary was to make alliances against Germany, Austria, and Turkey, who were collaborating commercially to develop a Berlin to Bagdad railroad. The Russians first sought the cooperation of the statesmen in control of the French Foreign Office. This was an easy task, because by article 8 of the French law, July 16, 1875, the President of the French Republic has exclusive authority to negotiate and ratify treaties without the knowledge of the French people, the French Parliament, or even the French Cabinet.

Casimir Perier, the French President, and Delcassé, French Minister of the Foreign Office, in 1892 arranged the treaty by exchange of letters with Mouraviev, Russian Minister of Foreign Office. The few individuals at the head of the two Foreign Offices thus bound the Russian and the French people to attack the German people without notice in the event that Austria (e. g.) should ever mobilize. The Russians knew they could make Austria mobilize. This they did when they were ready in 1914. The treaty referred to says in plain words:

"2. In case the forces of the Triple Alliance, or of one of the powers which are a party to it (e. g., Austria), should be mobilized, France and Russia, at the first indication of the event, and without a previous agreement being necessary, shall mobilize all their forces immediately and simultaneously and shall transport them as near to their frontiers as possible.

"3. . . . These forces shall begin complete action with the greatest dispatch, so that Germany will have to fight at the same time in the east and in the west.

"4. The staffs of the armies of the two countries shall constantly plan in concert in order to prepare for and facilitate the execution of the measures set forth above.

"They shall communicate to each other, in time of peace, all the information regarding the armies of the Triple Alliance which is in, or shall come into, their possession," etc.

Up to the end of the World War neither the Russian nor French Parliaments were ever informed with regard to this treaty. It was the work of a very few men imbued with nationalism, militarism, and imperialism. There was another secret treaty between the Russian and French statesmen as to how they would divide German territory. The French statesmen were to have a free hand on the Rhine, were to recover Alsace-Lorraine, were to get the coal of the Saar Valley, etc. The Russians were to take what they pleased of eastern Germany. The people of Russia and France (much less the people of Germany) did not know of either of these secret treaties. They did not know that they would be sent to their deaths in a gigantic war that would wound or kill 37,000,000 people. With patriotic faith they accepted the leadership of their officials and paid a terrible penalty for it.

The Russian statesmen, in pursuance of this planning of the World War, borrowed something over seven thousand million dollars from the industrious French people, a newspaper campaign being put on for that purpose subsidized by a portion of the very money borrowed from the French people, and expended by French ministers to the subsidized French press, which advocated the purchase of Russian bonds as a sound investment. With the proceeds of this money the Russian statesmen built military railroads up to the German border; built munition plants, and established the greatest army then existing in the world, estimated at 2,230,000 men available for quick action by August 1, 1914. Dobrorolsky, in charge of mobilization, in his article on the mobilization of the Russian Army (see Revue d'Histoire de la Guerre Mondiale, April and July, 1923), says that the mobilization of July, 1914, called to the support of Russia approximately 15,000,000 men. At the Franco-Russian military conference of 1913, General Joffre assured the Russian General Staff that France would have ready for quick action 1,500,000 men. There were no natural boundaries to protect German territory on the east.

The German military leaders were thus placed in a condition of extraordinary peril in being required to protect two frontiers against Russia and France, either one of whom had more troops than Germany. The German leaders apparently knew nothing of this secret treaty, but were full of suspicion, and to the extent of their capacity developed their military preparation. The German people were encircled.

The Russian statesmen had also a secret treaty with the statesmen of Rumania, of Bulgaria, of Serbia; a secret understanding with Edward Grey, of the British Foreign Office; a gentleman's understanding with the officials of Italy. France had a gentleman's understanding with Edward Grey, by which the French coast on the west was to be defended by the British Fleet and a British Army of 160,000 men were to be thrown on the French left wing in the event of war, all of which was carried out. Belgium was reliable, and Germany was encircled on land and sea. Germany's allies were Bulgaria (which had a secret treaty with Russia), Turkey (which was isolated), and Austria, which was threatened with internal revolution by the Pan Slav movement. The German leaders did not count on Italy, as Von Moltke explained in his report of 1912. Germany was weak (very weak compared to the forces against Germany), and the German leaders knew it.

The German statesmen made numerous attempts at a friendly rapprochement with the Russian statesmen, with the French statesmen, and with the English statesmen, but were always defeated by French influence. A deliberate part of the strategy of the Russian and French leaders, engineering the World War, was to make the German leaders appear responsible before the world of having willfully launched the World War. It was not very difficult to do this, for in Germany there were a greater or less number of chauvinists, like Von Bernhardi, who praised war as desirable, and the enthusiasm and pride of William II made him at times appear as "rattling the sword" and as a "knight in shining armor." The real truth is that the German people and the German Government and the German Kaiser had shown themselves attached to the doctrine of European peace for over 40 years. They armed for fear and drilled with patriotic pride. Many of the French leaders had never forgiven the German leaders for the humiliation of the Franco-Prussian War of 1870. Many of them were influenced deeply by the desire for revenge, but all this might have come to naught except for the intriguing of the Russian leaders and what they were able to accomplish by secret diplomacy and the cooperation of a very small number of Serbian and French leaders and the conviction that the British leaders, in the event of war, would support France against Germany.

It is perfectly obvious to all students of history that the French people, the English people, the Russian people, the German and Austrian people went into the war moved by a spirit of loyalty and patriotism, and with honest hearts, calling God to witness as to the purity of their intentions. They had been misled by the use of their own money taken from them by taxes and used for propaganda through a subservient press subsidized to support the arguments of the leaders.

To impose on the French Government the secret obligation to cooperate with the Russian leaders in an attack on Germany, it was only necessary to make Austria mobilize or threaten to mobilize. This was not a difficult task. It was accomplished through the Pan-Slav movement. Austria had millions of Slav subjects. The Russian statesmen encouraged Austria to take over the administration of Bosnia and Herzegovina, which contained a Slav population. This action of Austria was treacherously used by the Russian statesmen to stimulate the hostility of the statesmen of Serbia against Austria.

Russian money was lavishly used to subsidize the Serbian press in a campaign of defamation against the Austrian leaders, urging the policy of a greater Serbia uniting all the Slavs under one government. This meant the disintegration and destruction of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. This conspiracy against the Austrian Government, encouraged by the Russian and Serbian leaders, finally led to the murder of Ferdinand, the Crown Prince of Austria, and his consort, on Austrian territory, with the connivance and aid of Serbian officials. The Serbian cabinet were advised of the plot, took no effective steps to prevent it, and did not inform the Austrian Government of the danger.

The Serbian intrigue against the Austrian leadership had reached a point where either it had to be checked or the Austro-Hungarian Empire had to dissolve. Russia's false pretense of a duty to protect Serbia was artificial and without either legal or moral foundation. It was a pretext to a desired war.

Under those conditions Francis Joseph, the venerable Emperor, sent a messenger to see William II on the 5th of July, 1914, at Potsdam. William II, deeply moved by the murder of the crown prince, gave his consent that Austria should deliver a sudden and swift blow to Serbia, believing that it was a "local controversy" and could be maintained as a "local" matter, and that Serbia deserved a rebuke. He had very good reason to believe this, because the other Balkan wars had been held by the great powers as "local" affairs that did not necessarily mean a general European war. For a century it had been the diplomatic practice to treat Balkan disputes as local and subject to adjustment by the powers. Austria in attacking Serbia formally disclaimed any intent to appropriate Serbian territory or to destroy Serbia's sovereignty, and solemnly assured the powers that its sole purpose was to protect the life of the Austrian Government from Serbian intrigue.

Bogitchevitch, in his recent book The Causes of the War (p. 68), called attention to an interview given by Sazonoff, Russia's Minister of Foreign Affairs, to the German press October 8, 1912, in which he states emphatically that the Balkan conflicts were regarded by the great powers as "local" matters.

This expression from the head of the Russian Foreign Office in the Berlin press on the occasion of his visit there was a declaration of the highest possible importance in deceiving the German and Austrian leaders. It must be remembered that the German leaders did not absolutely know of the secret treaties to attack Germany in case of Austria's mobilization. That was only assuredly known to the French and Russian leaders, and possibly to some of their allies, and therefore while the blunder made by William II on July 5, 1914, was a very serious one, it did not involve the moral culpability with which it has been charged. William II did not intend to unleash the European war. He did not know that the mobilization of Austria instantly meant a European war, and necessarily would lead to an attack on Germany by Russia, France, Great Britain, and other allies. The German and Austrian leaders tried to localize the conflict. The Russian and French and Serbian leaders were determined on a general European war.

An American can well understand how Edward Grey would throw his support to France against Germany, with its Prussian military system and Hohenzollern dynasty. British leaders would naturally take the position they believed to be the best British interest. While the record does not show that Edward Grey wished war, even his friends must confess that his actions contributed to it because Russia and France knew that he would support them in case of war, and thus they were encouraged to war, and the German and Austrian leaders did not know that he would oppose them until too late, and thus they were not discouraged in time. The German leaders hoped for neutrality. They tried, being ignorant of the secret treaties and agreements against them, to secure the neutrality of France, Great Britain, and Belgium, when they saw themselves menaced by the Russian mobilization. Of course, they failed.

All the leading European nations contributed in part to the war by the spirit of chauvinism, militarism, and commercial imperialism, but the responsible leaders of Germany did not will the war; did not begin it. They were the victims of the conspiracy of the Russian statesmen who with infinite craft wove a web of encirclement so clever that many of the statesmen of their entente allies had no clear conception of what the Russian intention was.

When Austria delivered its ultimatum to Serbia July 23, 1914 (already anticipated by the European statesmen), the enemies of the German Government were ready for war.

JULY 24, 1914

Previous to the Austrian ultimatum Great Britain had already mobilized its war fleet, over 400 vessels, off Spithead.

On July 24, 1914, before Serbia replied, the British fleet was ready for war. On Sunday morning, August 2, the British regiments marched through London with full kit for the front, in pursuance of the Anglo-French understanding.

On July 24 the Russian Ministerial Council ordered Russian mobilization; confirmed by the crown council. The military officials were determined on a general mobilization, as will appear from the account of Dobrorolsky, the general in charge of Russian mobilization. The pretense that the Russian mobilization was a partial mobilization was merely a piece of Russian hypocrisy. The pretense that Sazonoff really wanted European peace had no foundation of fact. Sazonoff and Izvolski had been planning the European war for years, and the pretense of Sazonoff that the war came at an inauspicious time is not true.

Boghitchevitch, who was the diplomatic representative of Serbia in Paris up to 1907, and then in Berlin up to 1914, says with regard to Sazonoff and the expression of Sazonoff regretting that the war had been launched too soon and at a moment which did not appear to him propitious:

"The insincerity of the minister was complete. But his hypocritical declarations succeeded in making him appear before the European cabinets as an adversary of Russian Pan-Slavism, of which he was on the contrary—the course of events of the war of 1914 demonstrated it—the damned soul."

Boghitchevitch is quite right. Sazonoff's pretense that he favored peace was entirely insincere. He categorically refused in advance to consider any modifying influence from Great Britain or France in Russia's artificial, unfounded controversy with Austria over Serbia—just as Viviani and Poincaré refused to try to exercise any moderating influence on the policy of Sazonoff. Sukomlinov said to Baron Rosen, July 25, 1914, "This time we shall march." Edward Grey expressed the opinion that the Austrian mobilization would, of course, be followed by the Russian mobilization and did not discourage this act of war.

William II and his chancellor were the only ones in very high place who when they discovered a European war in sight strenuously attempted to stop it.

July 24, 1914, was a very historic day. On that day the Belgian Foreign Office sent out a circular to Belgian officials that Belgium was completely mobilized.

On July 24 France ordered from Africa the Moroccan troops and took preliminary steps for mobilizing. On July 24 France had already withdrawn its navy from the Atlantic seaport to the Mediterranean, relying upon British protection.

On July 24 the English Government had been committed by Edward Grey to Russia and France on land and sea (see De Siebert dispatches).

On July 24 Serbia mobilized.

On July 24 Russia's Ministerial Council ordered Russian mobilization.

On July 24 Raymond Poincaré, President of France, and Viviani, Minister of Foreign Office, had just left the Russian court, where they were received with enormous pomp and circumstance, and where they gave assurances to the Russian leaders that France was ready for war and would support Russia. Poincaré and Viviani reached Paris on July 29, and on the night of the 30th the following dispatch was sent (telegram 216 of Izvolski to Sazonoff):

"From military attaché to War Minister. 1 a. m.

"The French War Minister informed me in earnest, hearty tones that the Government is firmly decided upon war and requested me to confirm the hope of the French general staff that all our efforts will be directed against Germany and that Austria will be treated as a negligible quantity."

There can be no manner of doubt about the meaning of this telegram nor the actions of all the Allies in concert on July 24, notwithstanding the fact that with great hypocrisy Viviani and Sazonoff continued to talk about a peaceful settlement, and Poincaré on July 31 published a self-serving letter to the King of England urging peace—an insincerity incredible, but useful, very useful, in convincing the English people and the world of Poincaré's innocence and of the guilt of German leadership in launching the World War. Poincaré was not innocent.

William II, through Von Bethmann-Hollweg, demanded of the Austrian leaders conciliatory steps and was successful in getting the Austrian leaders to make important concessions that would have made peace a certainty if they had been met halfway or in any degree.

They were not met halfway. They were not met at all. The Russian leaders were determined on war, and they had agreed with the French leaders that Germany should be made to appear before the world as the aggressor. They, therefore, refused to stop their general mobilization and had the German military leaders in a position where they saw the general mobilization proceeding and knew that a Russian general mobilization meant war. The Czar himself had given his military subordinates to understand that a general mobilization meant war, and when the general mobilization was issued it was in substance and in effect a declaration of war against Germany. In the Czar's mobilization order of September 30, 1912, it was in terms declared "equivalent to the notification of a state of war with Germany." Sukomlinov said to Baron Rosen July 25, 1914: "Cette fois nous marcherons." The German leaders did not then know of this boast to Rosen, but they did know that Russian mobilization meant war and that if they waited too long it would make it impossible to defend Germany. Their only chance of success lay in superior speed and efficiency. They were coerced into war by this recognized military necessity, as the Russians intended. When Austria was induced to mobilize by the Pan-Slav Serbian and Russian conspiracy upon that instant Russia and France were mutually pledged by the secret treaty of 1892 to attack Germany, and the German leaders would have been fully justified then in declaring a state of war existing if they had known of this secret agreement. Common decency and common fairness in exercising judgment makes it necessary to remember that the German leaders did not know of the secret treaties. But Poincaré knew them, as President of France, and during the two preceding years he had repeatedly and in daily conversations (Un Livre Noir) assured Izvolski and the Russian Government that he would support Russia in a war against Germany.

Prof. Sidney B. Fay (New Republic, October 14, 1923, p. 197) points out and answers Poincaré's pretenses that he was a victim of German aggression. Poincaré's pose that he was the victim of Germany's premeditated assault has no foundation of fact. The evidence against him is now complete, and the more he disclaims the more he finds himself contradicted by the evidence and by an increasing army of scholars.

Poincaré knew from the secret Franco-Russian convention that "the aggressor shall be the power which mobilizes first" (No. 53), and that "mobilization is the declaration of war." (No. 71.)

He knew the Russian mobilization was a secret declaration of war by the secret Franco-Russian agreement. His repeated assertion that William II started the war by declaring a state of war existing (August 1) is contradicted flatly by his secret contract with Russia.

Poincaré flatters the French people and defends himself by an unending repetition of the well-known untruth that "the republican institutions of France are so conceived that no man can substitute his will for that of the people." The French President can do that very thing under the French law of 1875 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, December 18, 1923), and Poincaré did that very thing in sustaining and promoting the secret presidential treaty with Russia, where the French people were bound without their knowledge to wage war on the German people.

Even the French Parliament was ignorant of this secret treaty wherein Poincaré's will to war was leading them to ruin. Is Poincaré's flattering assurance that no man "can substitute his will for that of the people" true or false? What became of the "will of the people," who did not even know the secret treaty that bound democratic France to suffer for autocratic Russia, much less approve it?

Poincaré writes that "the foreign policy of France, before and since the war, has been conducted openly and in complete accord with the Parliament."

The secret treaties and archives now available completely disproves this assertion, and that the assertion is not innocently made is demonstrated by Izvolski's dispatches to Sazonoff, March 14, 1912, November 28, 1912, etc.

Poincaré wraps himself in the cloak of "France," and loudly proclaims "France has not wished war," and repeats and repeats and repeats such truisms, but peace-loving, beauty-loving France is one thing, Poincaré is another thing. Poincaré is not France, and France is not Poincaré.

France desired peace.

Poincaré desired war, and engineered the unfortunate, splendid French people into a gigantic disaster.

Even the people of Alsace-Lorraine were opposed to war (see unanimous resolution May 6, 1913, Diet of Alsace-Lorraine), but Poincaré (of Lorraine) desired war and revenge, and he substituted his will for theirs.

October, 1920, at University of Paris, he said " . . . I have not been able to see any other reason for my generation living except the hope of recovering our lost provinces."

Poincaré attempts to discredit the dispatches between Izvolski and the Russian Foreign Office which photographed Poincaré and his war-provoking policies by calling them "Soviet" and "Bolshevik" publications. Their authenticity and veracity are well established, and even his own friend Sazonoff, now in Paris, does not dare to deny their authenticity.

Poincaré's pose as the apostle of peace and the champion of truth would be amusing if it were not so harmful in misleading the world.

Let us give him credit for believing that he was leading France to a "glorious victory" and into an "era of greater splendor," and that his motives were inspired by patriotism and true love of country. He has played his part. Many men have been misled by the brilliancy of their own imaginations and failed to realize until too late the relentless law of gravity which at last controls all things human.

Poincaré is brilliant, brave, intellectual, and of enormous industry, but he is pitifully weak when standing before the majesty of God's truth.

Many Frenchmen have pointed out Poincaré's responsibility. It was done by Valliant Couturier, "On the honor of an old French soldier," on the floor of the House of Delegates of France, etc., and by many French writers, such as Pavet, Marchand, Caillaux, Morhardt, Victor Margueritte, Fabre-Luce, Judet, Lazare, DeMartial, Dupin, DeTourey, etc. Un Livre Noir convicts Poincaré completely, but actions speak louder than words, and Poincaré's actions show that he willed the war and helped to plan it with Izvolski and Sazonoff.

But while on July 24 England, France, Belgium, Russia, Serbia were all ready for war, and Russia, Serbia, and France under treaty contract to attack Germany and Austria, William II, who has been painted by propaganda as the monster who wickedly unchained the dogs of war, was quietly cruising in northern waters on the Baltic, apparently unconscious that his complete ruin was impending. He came back on Sunday, the 26th of July, and began his frenzied but useless appeals for European peace. Even Sazonoff tells that the Kaiser begged the Czar to keep his troops from the border, and that William II was "nearly frantic." The die was cast. The war was already in progress. The Entente mobilization was already started. The World War had begun. William II was wasting his breath.

In Current History of May, 1925, Hon. John S. Ewert, the Canadian historian, gives a splendid sketch of the Russian order for general mobilization, in which is clearly set forth in detail the evidence of Russian insincerity, intrigue, and responsibility for the first steps of the war. His exceedingly able work, "The roots and causes of the wars, 1914-1918," brilliantly tells the story of responsibility.

The French Ambassador, Paleologue, suggested that the general staff of Russia take the responsibility of the Russian mobilization, and let the Foreign Office be free to deny mobilization. False peace representations were made to the German leaders, both in Berlin, St. Petersburg, and Paris, with a view (as the official dispatches show) to keeping them quiet until the avalanche was well started. When, on the 31st of July, it became obvious to the military leaders of Germany that the Russian mobilization was threatening them in a very dangerous way, they demanded action by the Kaiser. Under this pressure, the Kaiser demanded the cessation of the Russian mobilization by noon the next day. At 7 p. m., on Saturday, August 1, having received no reply, the Kaiser, through the German ambassador at St. Petersburg, on the ground of Russia's acts, declared a state of war existing between Russia and Germany, and the war was on "officially." He was fully justified by the facts. The Kaiser could only declare a war for defense constitutionally. When he declared solemnly to the German people that the sword was forced in his hand, he spoke the simple truth, but all the world made mock of it, for Germany, instantly blockaded by land and sea, was then painted by world-wide propaganda as having planned and launched the World War for purposes of world conquest, and the world has largely believed this monstrous perversion of truth.

But "Love of truth is the sovereign good of human nature," and in the course of time the truth is mighty and will prevail. "Ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free." The lovers of truth are many.

One thing is conceded by everybody. The people of Russia, France, and England, and the people of Germany and Austria had no desire to kill each other or to be killed. The unfortunate people of all these nations went into war in a patriotic spirit, following their leaders, believing in them, trusting in their wisdom and justice. When the Russians found they had been betrayed, they drove their former leaders from Russia. The emperors and various small kings disappeared.

The Russian and French leaders who brought on this war are of little present consequence. Most of them are dead or in oblivion. The discussion of the causes of the war should not be diverted into stigmatizing individuals. What the world needs is to remember that the spirit of militarism and imperialism led to the war by intrigues, through secret treaties. If the diplomacy of Europe had been open diplomacy this war could not have happened, and the President of the United States, in laying down the conditions of peace on the 14 points, showed great wisdom in demanding open diplomacy. The peace of Europe requires not only a will to peace, but a will to open international intercourse, based on justice, common sense, and truth.

It is convenient to put the control of foreign affairs in an executive office where the records are kept and preserved and known, but it is dangerous to give control over foreign affairs to foreign office officials without parliamentary supervision. The structure of the French Government has this serious defect, and this is largely true of the British Foreign Office. The world has much to be thankful for, nevertheless. The militaristic dynasties have been overthrown, and 55 nations have now assembled in Geneva, pledged to principles of international cooperation on the basis of justice. The people of the United States believe in these fundamental principles, and are largely responsible for the establishment of the system at Geneva.

Not all of our statesmen have yet found themselves willing that our country should join the League of Nations because of the discovery of the secret agreements and selfish intrigues of Europe, and lack of good faith in dealing with the United States. Certain European statesmen should remember that on the 4th of November, 1918, they agreed on the 14 points, and then, immediately that the German people forced their leaders to surrender, the Entente leaders betrayed these promises in a number of important particulars. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD December 19, 1923, p. 876.)

Nevertheless, even these very Governments have been since the war increasingly useful in promoting the doctrines of liberty and justice, and in opening a new era of international understanding, international peace, and international good will through the League of Nations. They have our sympathy and respect in such a policy.

Let us, if possible, forget the weaknesses and errors of leaders and concentrate our attention upon the principles by which the future of the world may be safeguarded. Let us vigorously help to establish the doctrine of open diplomacy, parliamentary control of foreign affairs, mutual pledges of security, peaceful settlement of all disputes, and then international disarmament is made more practicable and the people may make it impossible for the ambition, fear, vanity, or other folly of human leadership again to crucify mankind.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, April 15, 1926

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Remind us, our blessed heavenly Father, that no good thing wilt Thou withhold from them that walk uprightly. By the memory of the past we are encouraged to come to Thee. Touched with a feeling of our infirmities—Thou knowest us. Do Thou abide with us according to our requirements, and make our weakness to become our strength. Whatever the exactions and the responsibilities, teach us to be patient and faithful. If our liberties, our pleasures, or self-indulgence hold us from Thee, the Lord pity us and give us the freedom of our best selves. Keep Thou our pathway clear, our step firm, and may we never catch up with our vision. More and more may our lives become beautified in kindness, charity, and friendship and reflected in unselfish living. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

A MEMORIAL TO THOMAS JEFFERSON, THE AUTHOR OF THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, AND TO JAMES MADISON, THE "FATHER OF THE CONSTITUTION"

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on the House Joint Resolution 182.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on House Joint Resolution 182. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, the Declaration of Independence of the thirteen United Colonies of America was proclaimed on the 4th day of July, in the year of our Lord 1776, whereby the United States assumed—the separate and equal station among the powers of the earth to which the laws of nature and of nature's God entitle them—

And the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of this immortal document is to be celebrated in 1926 throughout the length and breadth of this—indestructible Union of indestructible States,

Not only is the year 1926 the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the Declaration of Independence written by Thomas Jefferson, but it also marks the one hundred and seventy-fifth anniversary of the birth of James Madison, "The Father of the Constitution." Through the Government of the Federal Union established on the 4th day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine, under the Constitution of the United States the principles of the Declaration of Independence were rendered effective, and representative government made its formal entry into the world.

It is eminently fitting and proper, therefore, that the anniversaries of these two immortal documents and the two great Americans most closely associated with them should be celebrated together and that congressional action should be had in recognition of these events.

The city of Washington is filled with statues and public memorials to many Americans, and it seems strange that there is no public monument at the seat of the Government of the Nation in memory of either Thomas Jefferson or James Madison. I have introduced in the last Congress, and in this Congress, a bill to provide for public monuments to these two pre-eminent Americans, but at this time I merely wish to call attention to House Concurrent Resolution No. 23, which provides for a more modest and unique memorial. If this resolution is adopted by Congress, the Government Printing Office will be authorized to print in one volume, as a memorial to Thomas Jefferson and James Madison, all of the fundamental historical documents relating to the birth of the United States of America as a Nation.

These two great Americans were most intimately associated with these vital contributions to our form of government. It must be recalled once again that the author of the Declaration of Independence was Thomas Jefferson. It must be further recalled that the movement for a revision of the Articles of Confederation so as to—render the Federal Constitution adequate to the exigencies of the Government and the preservation of the Union—was conducted by James Madison.

It was also James Madison who kept the only authentic and accurate account of the proceedings in the Federal convention in which the Constitution was framed. There can be no dispute that he is well entitled to be called "The Father of the Constitution."

It has always seemed to me that these basic documents on which our form of republican government is founded are too little studied and too little known. The representative government of the States of the American Union, organized under the Federal Constitution, is continually threatened by strange doctrines, and its principles are inadequately known and appreciated within the United States by multitudes of our fellow citizens enjoying its inestimable benefits. The safety of republican institutions admittedly and proverbially depends upon the frequent recurrence to first principles.

Therefore, it is suggested that in addition to the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States there should be printed, in one volume, all of the other historical documents that preceded and followed and pertained to these two vital declarations of the principles underlying the theory of our republican form of government. Many of these documents have never been printed or published in any form whatsoever, and most of them are not available except in the archives of some of the larger libraries in the United States. A casual reading of the list which I herewith append will immediately suggest to anyone the immense value and interest that this volume will be to lawyers, schools, colleges, and generally to all students of the early history of our country. A careful study of these documents should be required in every school throughout our land, and yet many of them are unavailable except to a select few who have the means to come to Washington to engage in research work. The wide dissemination of these papers, dealing with those momentous and stirring questions associated with the birth of our country, would do incalculable good. Why these glorious pages in our early history have remained closed so long to the general public is beyond comprehension.

Once this volume is made a public document, copies would be available at cost through the Government Printing Office to students, lawyers, colleges, and for distribution to the public generally. And it is this general distribution that I am seeking. I am firmly of the belief that there would be an overwhelming demand for this book.

Many suggestions have been made as to a fitting manner to celebrate the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the Declaration of Independence. Congress has recently appropriated $2,186,000 for the Government to join in the celebration to be held in Philadelphia. It is eminently proper to celebrate the Declaration of Independence in the city of Philadelphia, but after all an exposition, in its very nature, is a transitory thing, and the memory of it soon fades. My suggestion is for a permanent memorial that will last for all time to come, and when it is realized that the cost is less than $10,000 it would seem reasonable that Congress might seriously consider the matter.

No one can deny that the publication in permanent form of the historical documents pertaining to the birth of our country, such as the Declaration of Independence, the Articles of Confederation, the Constitution, the Instructions to the Delegates to the Federal Convention, the Madison Debates of the Federal Convention, and the many other relevant and pertinent historical documents mentioned in the appended list, would be one of the most fitting ways to celebrate the year 1926 in commemoration of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the Declaration of Independence of the United States and the one hundred and seventy-fifth anniversary of the birth of James Madison; and it is more than fitting that this volume should take the form of a memorial to the two outstanding Americans who had the most to do with the framing of our republican form of government: Thomas Jefferson, the author of the Declaration of Independence, and James Madison, the father of the Constitution.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA PARK AND PLAYGROUND SYSTEM

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 8830, disagree to the Senate's amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 8830, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. The Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 8830. An act amending the act entitled "An act providing for a comprehensive development of the park and playground system of the National Capital, approved June 6, 1924."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. Reserving the right to object, the principle, if not the only amendment that the Senate placed on the bill, as I understand it, is the one placing one-half of the cost on the United States.

Mr. BLANTON. No; that is a different bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. What is this bill about?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. It enlarges the personnel by adding four men from civilian life.

Mr. CRAMTON. Does it take away the chief forester or the chief engineer?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. It does not.

Mr. CRAMTON. Has it anything to do with the expense?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Nothing to do with the expense.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman if this prescribes who is to go on the commission?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. It says that the President of the United States shall appoint four eminent citizens trained in city planning in addition to the present personnel.

Mr. MADDEN. There are some Members of the House and Members of the Senate on the present commission?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I wish to express my strong disapproval—if it amounts to anything, and I suppose it does not—to any of these commissions containing membership from the House or the Senate where they are called upon to legislate upon things that they act upon as administrators. I think it is bad practice and a bad policy; it is bad for the Government and bad for the people. Our position should be here to act as critics of the administrators and not as advocates of the things that the administrators want. We can not be free if we are a part of the administration.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will permit me, and especially where Virginia and Maryland are so closely interrelated with the District of Columbia that you can not tell where the line begins and ends, and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ZIHLMAN] is one of those gentlemen.

Mr. CRAMTON. Let me make sure, Mr. Speaker. It was proposed to remodel this commission by taking off the chief forester and one or two others. That has been abandoned, has it? This proposition does not remove anyone now on the commission?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. It does not.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. ZIHLMAN, Mr. GIBSON, and Mr. BLANTON.

POTOMAC PARKWAY COMMISSION

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I call up from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 4785) providing for the completion of the acquisition of land by the Potomac Parkway Commission, and move to concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland calls up the bill H. R. 4785—

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I want some time on that.

Mr. CRAMTON. Reserving the right to object—

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman can not object.

Mr. DYER. Unanimous consent is not necessary.

Mr. CRAMTON. A point of order, Mr. Speaker. Does it not require unanimous consent?

Mr. BLANTON. It is amended by the Senate. It is a preferential motion the gentleman is making. I want some time.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Just a moment.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw any point of order. I did not understand the motion.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I called up this bill from the Speaker's table and moved to concur in the Senate amendments, which I understand is a proper and privileged motion.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will.

Mr. CRAMTON. Does the gentleman intend to give the House liberal opportunity for debate on this proposition, which involves some several hundred thousand dollars of charge on the Treasury? Personally I should like some time on the question.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will not call this bill up if it will cause debate.

Mr. BLANTON. It ought to be debated. This is a proposition this House has turned down, and it ought not to be called up without debate.

Mr. TILSON. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his request, and I will help arrange—

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that this is not a case of unanimous consent, but thinks it is privileged; and if the matter is one that is likely to cause debate, the Chair thinks he ought to be advised.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I withdraw the request.

COMMERCIAL AVIATION

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I renew the request to take the bill (S. 41) from the Speaker's table, to disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 41), disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked. Is there objection?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to ask the gentleman if that is the civil aviation bill?

Mr. PARKER. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Has the Senate taken action on the amendments since we passed it the other day?

Mr. PARKER. Yes; and have sent it back asking for a conference.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will not the gentleman give us an opportunity to look over the Senate amendments before he prefers his request? I would like to see it as I seem to be the only one of the minority who opposed it.

Mr. PARKER. Of course the gentleman has got me—

Mr. HUDDLESTON. It is a very hasty action. We took action on it, I believe, either on Monday or Tuesday.

Mr. PARKER. We are simply insisting on our amendment; it is not a Senate amendment.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I may be in favor of the Senate amendment if I got a chance to see it.

Mr. PARKER. They have not amended it; they simply disagree to our amendment and ask for a conference.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. They took no action?

Mr. PARKER. No; they disagreed to our amendment and asked for a conference.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 41) to encourage and regulate the use of aircraft in commerce, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the conferees.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. PARKER, Mr. COOPER of Ohio, Mr. MERRITT, Mr. RAYBURN, and Mr. LEA of California.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 6730) to detach Fulton County from the Jonesboro division of the eastern district of the State of Arkansas and attach the same to the Batesville division of the eastern judicial district of the State of Arkansas, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 6730, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Clerk reported the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

OLDROYD COLLECTION OF LINCOLN RELICS

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have extended in the Record the speech delivered over the radio by my colleague, Mr. POU, upon the purchase of the Oldroyd collection of Lincoln relics.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks, I insert herewith a speech delivered over the radio by my colleague, Hon. EDWARD W. POU, on March 24, 1926:

Congressman RATHBONE, of Illinois, whose father accompanied Abraham Lincoln to Ford's Theater on the night of the assassination of President Lincoln, has introduced in the House of Representatives a bill, numbered H. R. 8319. The bill provides an appropriation in the sum of $50,000 for the purchase of the entire Oldroyd collection of Lincoln relics, containing 3,000 pieces, more or less, now on display in the Government property known as the house in which President Lincoln died, No. 518 Tenth Street NW., Washington City. A bill almost identical with that introduced by Congressman RATHBONE has passed the Senate three times, once at least by unanimous consent, but for some reason the House has never taken action.

Mr. H. B. Gauss, Washington correspondent of the Chicago Daily News, under date of March 4, in a letter to his paper, speaks of the Oldroyd collection as follows:

"Regarded by many historians as one of the world's most complete collection of Lincoln relics, it is felt that the exhibit could properly form one of the adjuncts of Washington's historic shrines." Captain Oldroyd for 60 years has devoted his life to the task of bringing together every available authentic relic of the Nation's great President. He has brought together more than 3,000 articles, constituting one of the most interesting and valuable collections ever assembled in behalf of a human being. There are books which Lincoln used as a struggling young lawyer; there are pieces of furniture from the Lincoln homestead, Springfield, Ill.; there are 11 autograph letters and documents; there are 70 badges and flags relating to the Lincoln campaign in 1860; there are many caricatures of his administration; there are 1,000 biographies of the martyred President; 325 newspapers, dating from 1848 to 1865, containing his speeches, war papers, account of his death and burial; 255 funeral sermons, addresses, and eulogies delivered upon his death.

There are photographs and illustrations of Ford's Theater, the conspirators' trial and execution. Eighty-three engravings of the Lincoln family, 27 busts and statuettes, 24 medallions, 171 political and memorial medals struck in honor of the President. An original black locust rail, split by Lincoln in 1830. The office chair used by him in his law office at Springfield. An original reward bill offering $50,000 for the capture of Booth, Harold, and Surratt. There is the family Bible, out of which Lincoln's mother read to him when he was a young boy. The Bible is over 100 years old, and on the cover Lincoln wrote his name when not over 9 years of age.

Mr. and Mrs. Lincoln were ready to go to the theater, when two men asked him for a pass to Richmond, five days after the surrender of General Lee. The President returned to his office, wrote the following, went to Ford's Theater, and was shot two hours thereafter:

"No pass is necessary now to authorize anyone to go and return from Petersburg and Richmond. People go and return just as they did before the war. A. Lincoln."

This is the last piece of handwriting ever penned by the martyred President.

Captain Oldroyd has been offered $5,000 for this paper in the handwriting of Mr. Lincoln, the very last words ever penned by the martyred President.

I have felt that I could perform no better service than to use the 15 minutes accorded to me to-night in briefly describing the Oldroyd-Lincoln collection.

The State of Illinois has appropriated $50,000 to be used in purchasing this collection. It is also said that Mr. Henry Ford would willingly and gladly purchase the collection. Many persons have offered to buy from Captain Oldroyd particular pieces of the collection. Every offer has been declined. It is the ambition of Captain Oldroyd, it is his consecrated hope that the Nation will take over this collection.

I have talked with this man, and I believe the money consideration is secondary in his purpose and thought. He has paid out of his own pocket a considerable sum in assembling this wonderful collection—how much, he himself does not know. He will not even consider a sale to a private individual. He would not consider a sale to anyone who would have a commercial object in view. He is a patriotic American, who, as I do, places Lincoln upon the very highest pedestal a mortal can reach. He would feel that the great purpose of his life had been partially defeated if his collection should be disposed of in any way other than the acquiring of the same by the United States Government. He could undoubtedly dispose of his collection piece by piece for a much larger sum of money than the amount appropriated by the General Assembly of the State of Illinois.

I am told that a bill similar to that introduced by Congressman RATHBONE will probably be passed by the Senate. The chances are the House would pass such a measure by an overwhelming vote unless consideration of such measure were prevented by the legislative jam which occurs during the closing days of every session of Congress.

I have hoped that these remarks over the radio might arouse some interest, might result in putting some force behind the proposed measure.

Congress appropriated sufficient money to build the great Lincoln Memorial in Potomac Park. It is said there is no memorial building in the whole world which compares in beauty and majesty with this work of America's architect, artist, and builder. Instinctively one enters the Lincoln Memorial with head uncovered. In the silence of that great monument one contemplates Lincoln after he had reached the pinnacle of world fame. But standing in the midst of the collection of relics brought together by Captain Oldroyd one sees Lincoln, a child, listening to the reading of the Bible at his mother's knee; one sees him a 9-year old boy writing his name on the old Bible's leaf. He is seen as a very young man splitting rails to build a fence around his humble cabin. We see him as a struggling young lawyer working far in the night. We see him as success begins to crown the efforts of an honest, industrious life. We see him elected to Congress. We see him a giant in debate with another giant.

We see him victorious even in defeat; we see him elected President; we contemplate his course during the Civil War with wonder, for the people of the South were saying, "This man is our friend, not our enemy."

And when he was assassinated many there were throughout the South who said, "Now we have lost a sincere friend, wielding the greatest power to help us." All say this now.

When Abraham Lincoln was stricken down there fell one who had been raised up by Almighty God to lead all nations upward to a plane of nobler action and to point out to the children of America the pathway which leads to national greatness and permanent peace.

CONSIDERATION OF BILLS ON PRIVATE CALENDAR UNOBTAINED TO

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow, immediately upon the completion of the good roads bill, the House, as in Committee of the Whole House, may consider bills on the Private Calendar unobjected to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that to-morrow, immediately after the conclusion of the good roads bill, it may be in order to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, bills on the Private Calendar unobjected to. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, is the roads bill going to come ahead of the bankruptcy amendment? I understand that there are two reports from the Committee on Rules, one on the roads bill and one on the bankruptcy law.

Mr. SNELL. Is it the intention of the gentleman from Connecticut to change the program in regard to the bankruptcy bill?

Mr. TILSON. I had understood that the bankruptcy bill would require only a very short time.

Mr. SNELL. That is true. It is ready and on the calendar, ready to be brought up at any time, though not before the roads bill.

Mr. TILSON. Then, Mr. Speaker, I change my request so that consideration of bills on the Private Calendar may follow immediately the consideration of the bankruptcy bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut modifies his request and asks unanimous consent that to-morrow, immediately after concluding the consideration of the bankruptcy bill, it may be in order to consider, as in Committee of the Whole House, bills on the Private Calendar unobjected to. Is there objection?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. In case the bills on the Private Calendar are considered by unanimous consent, would the rules relating to the Consent Calendar prevail? That is, would one objection be sufficient in the first instance, and would it require three objections the next time the bill is called?

The SPEAKER. That rule would not apply in the case of the calling of the Private Calendar.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I thought if we were going to proceed under a consent arrangement, that would probably be the case.

The SPEAKER. An objection to a bill on the Private Calendar under the proposed order would not strike it from the calendar. It would merely prevent its present consideration, and the rule in respect to three objectors would not apply.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I understand it is the purpose of the gentleman from Connecticut later on to have a Private Calendar day at which bills that are objected to may be considered?

Mr. TILSON. That is my intention. At a later day it is expected to take up the bills on the Private Calendar that have been objected to and consider them in the regular way.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there are a good many of us interested in the good-roads proposition. Is it the intention of the majority leader to have that bill called up immediately after the transaction of the routine business this morning and the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL]?

Mr. TILSON. It is.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that if the House be in session on Saturday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES] may have permission to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that on Saturday next, if the House be in session, immediately after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of routine business, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES] may be permitted to address the House for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE LIGHTHOUSE SERVICE

The SPEAKER. When the House adjourned on Tuesday last the previous question had been ordered on the bill (H. R. 10860) to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to dispose of certain lighthouse reservations and to increase the efficiency of the Lighthouse Service, and for other purposes. A motion to recommit the bill, offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], was pending.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order for the Chair or some one else to let the membership of the House know that the motion to recommit is the same as the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], so that Members would know what they are voting on?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has stated it, whether it be in order or not.

Mr. MAPES. Would it also be in order to say that the motion to recommit was made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]?

The SPEAKER. It would be equally in order. The question is on the motion to recommit offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, would it not be well to report the bill by title and the motion?

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will report the bill by title and the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10860) to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to dispose of certain lighthouse reservations and to increase the efficiency of the Lighthouse Service, and for other purposes.

Mr. BLANTON moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, with instructions to that committee to report the same back forthwith with an amendment striking out all of section 8.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit. The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I call for a division.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—yeas 25, noes 108.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote, and make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and seventy Members are present—not a quorum.

Mr. TILSON. The roll call is automatic.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] to recommit the bill.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 55, nays 291, not voting 85, as follows:

GENERAL CLAIMS

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to a promise which I made on frequent occasions during the last Congress, early in this session of Congress I introduced a bill seeking a remedy for the intolerable situation which exists in Congress and out of Congress with reference to claims bills.

The purpose of the bill, Senate 1912, as amended, is to relieve Congress from an intolerable situation which exists in the manner of the adjudication of claims, the machinery heretofore devised, having completely broken down, is no longer a medium of justice and equity toward our citizens. During the last Congress, the Sixty-eighth, over 2,000 claims bills were introduced. Only 250 of such bills became law, the largest number in the history of the committee. During the session the committee had two day sessions and six evening sessions, the latter under unanimous consent. One of the day sessions was the regular day assigned to the committee under the rules. The other day session was a Calendar Wednesday on January 19, 1925, when the admiralty bill was considered and passed.

The Claims Committee is the oldest standing committee of the House, established November 13, 1794. The Court of Claims was established in 1855, its powers extended in 1862 and 1866, later by the Bowman Act in 1863. These various acts afforded little relief until 1887, when the Tucker Act "provided for bringing suits against the Government."

There is a rather interesting coincidence connected with these last two acts. The Bowman Act takes its name from Hon. Selwyn Z. Bowman, who at that time was a resident of my city of Somerville, in Massachusetts. I was only a boy, but I knew Selwyn Z. Bowman very well, and to-day he is hale and hearty at the age, I think, of 86, and is attending to his regular business. I have lived in the city of Somerville almost all of my life; but the coincidence is that the father of our colleague from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] introduced and passed the Tucker Act, which made the Bowman Act of some real value, and Mr. Tucker, during his incumbency here, represented the district in which I was born in the State of Virginia. I follow along with those two gentlemen in trying to find some relief for a situation that exists now to a much greater degree than it did in those days.

Concurrent jurisdiction in suits up to $10,000 was given to the United States district courts. Jurisdiction under these acts were limited to contract claims. Since then Congress has passed a number of laws granting additional relief. In 1914 to the Agriculture Department to reimburse owners of horses, vehicles, and so forth, lost, damaged, or destroyed while being used in fire fighting; in 1910 to the Commerce Department, empowering the Commissioner of Lighthouses to consider and settle claims occasioned by collision not to exceed $500; same power extended to the Superintendent of Coast and Geodetic Survey in 1920; in 1917, 1918, 1919, 1920, and 1922 the Navy Department was given additional powers; in 1914 the Post Office was given jurisdiction over burglary cases not exceeding $10,000 and in 1921 to settle damages to the amount not exceeding $500. This latter provision was extended to the War Department in 1920. In 1916 the Employees' Compensation Commission was established and in 1924 the World War veterans' act was passed. Two important acts were the act of 1922, known as the Underhill Small Claims Act, which gave the departments the power to settle property damage up to $1,000, and the admiralty act of 1925, which authorizes suits to be brought against the United States in admiralty for damages occasioned by Government-owned vessels.

I want to touch on these two matters particularly. In 1922 a small claims act, known as the Underhill Small Claims Act, was passed by this House. I say to you that that has worked admirably, economically, and equitably, and that over 1,500 claims have been settled at a minimum of cost, relieving the Congress of the burden of adjudicating over 1,500 claims. Last year we passed what is known as the admiralty act. Now, those of you who may be opposed to a change in the fundamental law of the land and hold the old idea that the king can do no wrong or that the sovereign or government can do no wrong will be interested to know that the admiralty act is the most drastic piece of legislation along that line that has ever been passed. It allows suits in admiralty for damages caused by United States vessels on the seas.

The sky is the limit and there is a hole in that. You can bring suits for damages because of accidents which occur on the seas and yet you have left out of consideration suits for damages which may occur on land. So, if any of you think that this bill of mine is drastic or revolutionary, just let me tell you it is simply a progressive step and in line with the measure which was passed last year.

In spite of all of this legislation, the number of damage claims before the Committee on Claims has increased this year, and it is a physical and mental impossibility to consider more than a very small proportion of them. The greatest dissatisfaction and the severest criticism of our Government in the matter of claims is the lack of a forum to which a claim may be taken as a matter of right as contrasted to the necessity for making supplication to favor of the governmental agency. Foreign governments are far more liberal in the practice of redress for claims than our Government. The idea that a government is immune from the jurisdiction of the courts is archaic, unjust, and inequitable. The Government can now be sued directly on matters of contract and in admiralty cases only.

In other words, if you are a big corporation, have a contract with the Government and the Government does not live up to its obligation, or does you an injury, you can sue the Government. If you are the owner of a great vessel costing a half million dollars or more and a Government vessel damages your vessel you can sue the Government; but if you are a poor citizen, an ordinary taxpayer, and the Government injures you or your property, you have no redress whatever except to come, with 2,000 others, to Congress, in its brief sessions, and ask Congress to adjudicate your claim.

Now, I am going to briefly set forth the provisions of the bill. First, it calls for an increase of the small claims act which was passed in 1922. The limitation contained in that act was $1,000, and departments were authorized to settle cases, where property damage occurred, up to that amount. When I introduced the bill it called for $5,000; the House passed it, however, with an amendment providing for $1,000. In turn the departments submit to Congress their findings and the amount of damages and file with their report a short history of the accident and the claim for damages. So I increase the amount from $1,000 to $5,000.

Now, gentlemen, if you can trust your departments with the millions of dollars we have appropriated yearly for every department of the Government, you certainly can trust the departments to settle these property damages, which are easily ascertained, up to $5,000. There is no opportunity for fraud or collusion. The department itself has to come back to Congress with its report, and the Committee on Appropriations has full jurisdiction to either refuse to make the payment or to act in accordance with the findings made by the department.

Second, it provides that suits may be brought in the United States district courts from this limitation of $5,000 up to $10,000, the United States district courts having joint jurisdiction with the Court of Claims in the settlement of these contract disputes of which I spoke previously. But in this case I make the limitation $10,000 in order that I may protect the poorer citizens. In other words, if I simply threw open the doors of the Court of Claims, men would have to come from California, from Texas, from Maine, or from other sections of the country to Washington to try their suits or go to great expense in hiring legal counsel. If you give them the right to sue in the district courts for a small amount up to $10,000 without a jury trial—and you want to keep in mind all through that in all these provisions I prohibit absolutely jury trials—

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. UNDERHILL. May I be allowed to proceed now, because I want to allow half an hour for answering questions later on?

We therefore protect the Government in suits brought by the local people in their local courts up to $10,000, and for amounts above $10,000 in the Court of Claims without jury trial.

You gentlemen who were here yesterday have in your minds a recent illustration of the futility of bringing such matters before this body. We lost an entire afternoon yesterday on a bill that never should have been brought before this body. My mind goes back only a year or two when we wasted another half day on this same bill, and my mind also goes back to the time when some members of two committees wasted considerable time in considering this matter. So you can see how ridiculous it is that we should continue this method of settling these complicated questions, which should really go to a court and be adjudicated there.

The third and what I consider the most important feature of the bill is for the settlement of personal injuries or death claims.

I provide that these may be settled by the Federal compensation board in much the same manner in which they perform a like service to Government employees. The provisions, however, are not nearly as liberal. The maximum amount is arbitrarily placed at $5,000—$5,000 for death or permanent injury. This may not seem just or equitable to you, but, gentlemen, it is a policy which has been adopted by your Claims Committee for the past five years—an arbitrary limit on the value of human life of $5,000. If they had the right to go before a jury, you can readily see how the emotions and the sympathies of the jurymen would be stirred to such an extent that these claims possibly might reach an enormous total. Five thousand dollars is only a small amount for compensation for the sufferings of some injured people, while a jury might, in many instances, award damages of $50,000 in another case, which would be far beyond the amount which the injury would really justify.

In cases of death and personal injury all classes of Government employees are protected through the medium of a Federal compensation act. It is only the poor taxpayer who has no redress except a plea to the Committee on Claims to which all private relief bills are referred and which is only a part of a very wretched, cumbersome, and wholly unsatisfactory system of affording relief. In case of a private employee, suit may be instituted in a court and damages recovered. There is no such remedy against the Government. The Committee on Claims has no facilities to determine questions of contributory negligence, sift evidence, and determine a host of questions which only a court or specially devised body can adequately consider. The passage of this bill will remedy an intolerable situation.

I want you to understand also that in all cases of contributory negligence the Government is protected by the provisions of this bill. Under the Federal employees' compensation act there is no question of contributory negligence, there is no question of the fault of some fellow employee, there is no assumption of risk, there is nothing of that sort; all of the benefit of the doubt is given to the injured employee; but in my bill I restrict it and I make it so the Government is protected in every regard and in every respect against attempted fraud.

Certain classes of claims in which relief is available under existing law are excluded.

Such, in brief, is the situation, the purpose of the bill, and the remedies proposed. To-day there is nothing adequate, scientific, or equitable relative to tort claims against the Government. It is a tremendous burden and expense to Congress in time and labor and embarrassment to individual Congressmen in their inability to get favorable action. Justice now awaits upon political considerations or the popularity of a Congressman or the influence of a Senator. It is expected that the Department of Justice would oppose such legislation on the grounds that it was revolutionary in its character, but the admiralty bill, which became a law in the last Congress, is the most drastic piece of tort legislation imaginable.

That is a part of their business, and when I first conceived this idea I realized and expected to have the opposition of the Department of Justice, because it is their business to oppose legislation of this character, but only on the ground that in the dark and dismal and distant ages of ignorance and injustice "The sovereign can do no wrong." If they continue to hold to that position, we will have to combat it here on the floor of the House until we educate them to a more humane view of matters.

Then I also call attention in the record to the fact that although I wrote the Department of Justice two years ago with reference to the admiralty bill, they offered no objection to that bill at the time, and when it passed the Senate there was not a word of opposition to it on the floor of the Senate, and yet, as I have said, it is as drastic a piece of legislation as you can conceive with reference to suits against the Government.

I would add that it is also as sensible a law as has been passed in recent years. Practically all of the departments are in favor of this legislation, and I believe that Congress, if given an opportunity to consider the bill on its merits, will pass the same by an overwhelming majority.

To-day's calendar carries 150 claims reported on favorably by the committee. Although the committee has been working faithfully since the convening of Congress, and it is now near the close of the session, only three bills reported by the committee have been acted upon. This is in no way the fault of the committee or the managers of the House, but because in the pressure of great public business it is no wonder that the sufferings of the individual citizen should go practically unnoticed. Congress is not the place to bring these claims. Sixteen busy Congressmen have devoted hours, days, and weeks and months to investigating these 150 claims favorably reported, and as many others that have been adversely acted upon and do not appear upon the calendar. These 150 claims have been reported favorably and unanimously by the committee. They must now have the unanimous consent of every Member of the House before they can be considered, and they must then follow practically the same procedure in another body. I have almost forgotten the details of bills which I examined and investigated in December and January, and other members of the committee find themselves in the same situation. All of their labors of months can be overturned or nullified by the whim, pique, or conscientious objection of an individual Member of the House.

The Federal Government is daily directing itself more and more into the affairs of the individual. Therefore the chances of injury because of carelessness of Government employees or because of unavoidable accident becomes greater all the time. The most important and legitimate function of the Government is the protection of the persons and property of its people. It provides such protection to the people one from the other, but with reference to itself neglects its most sacred duty. The Government which demands loyalty from its subjects should not deny justice to them. It may cost a little more money than the present system, but the Government will be repaid ten times over in loyalty, appreciation, and confidence of the people. [Applause.]

Now, gentlemen, I want to point out to you briefly some of the troubles which confront the Committee on Claims and confront each and every one of you individually.

This is a volume [indicating] consisting almost entirely of single sheets of bills referred to the Committee on Claims—almost 2,000 bills. It does not contain the Senate bills. You can see the impossibility of the Committee on Claims doing justice to you and to your people.

I want to tell you how many of you have written to me or have sent to me and asked me if I would not please give some attention to your particular claim.

There has been in the Sixty-ninth Congress requests for action in 700 different cases thus far, and we are only half through with this Congress. That is exclusive of the Senate bills.

Let me say a word in reference to Senate bills, without any criticism, because we are debarred by the rules of this House from doing that, but most of you have come in contact with this situation. The Senate passes most of these claims by courtesy. It does not demand from the department reports on the claims, but it passes them by courtesy. Then they come over here, and you go to the chairman of the Committee on Claims and say, "Here is a very pathetic case; the Senate passed it, and it is on the calendar. Will you not report it out?" I look it up and find that there is not a leg for it to stand upon. I come to you somewhat humiliated and tell you the circumstances, and you say that I am hard-boiled; that I am hard-hearted; and yet if I reported one of those bills and took it up on the floor of the House it would discredit the committee, and it would be thrown out on the objection of a hundred Members, let alone one. That is one thing that you are up against. We do not pass bills by courtesy; we pass them on their merits.

The number of bills introduced for Members by the committee in this Congress was 340. I want to call your attention to one thing. The committee never questions which side of the aisle a man sits on or what party he belongs to when a claim comes before us. Of the 340 bills that have been introduced in behalf of Members, 183 were from Republican Members and 157 from Democratic Members. You can see that the ratio is about 50-50, because there are more Republicans than Democrats.

In the last Congress there were 1,250 bills introduced in the House and 987 introduced in the Senate. The total number of House bills reported was 109 and 78 Senate bills. The total number of bills to become law was 160. The total claims of bills before our committee to-day is less than $12,000,000. That includes the good, bad, and indifferent; includes the French spoliation claims which we have not taken up, which amount to over a million dollars. We have turned down, I suppose, three or four million dollars of claims that had no standing or that we thought were unworthy.

Let me say that if these claims had their origin in an alien where the Government was responsible for his safety the Department of State would, as a diplomatic proposition, put it up to us, and we would have to pass the bill, no matter what the claim was.

How can we adjudicate these claims here? The power vested in the chairman of the Committee on Claims is tremendous and absolutely wrong. I can either refuse arbitrarily to consider your claim or I can take up each and every one of your claims to suit my convenience. Is it right to give that power to one Member of Congress? I claim that it is not right to give him that power or responsibility.

I have tried not to be influenced either by friendship or by any dislike I might have for an individual Member. I have tried to adjudicate all of these claims on their merits, and if I did not have the support of the finest bunch of men that ever were in Congress I could not do it. [Applause.] The Committee on Claims this year has worked like a pup at a root, and each Member at every meeting has been assigned a handful of claims and through the week, perhaps into the small hours of the morning, has studied them, and the next Friday has come to our meeting and made a report. He may have a half dozen reports to make, but we can hear but one report from that man, and he keeps these other five reports in his possession until he gets time to present them to the Committee on Claims. That is all wrong.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. HERSEY. I understand that the gentleman has a bill before his committee that would remedy this trouble?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. HERSEY. What is the situation of the bill? Has it been reported?

Mr. UNDERHILL. The bill is now on the calendar. I perhaps might give you a little outline of the parliamentary situation.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The great trouble, one of the first troubles, is that the gentleman has taken the Senate bill and has stricken out all after the enacting clause and incorporated his bill as an amendment, and that amendment is 19 pages long. That amendment will come before the House and we will have to consider it as one amendment. We can not pass on all of the various paragraphs in those 19 pages as we should. That is the only mistake the gentleman has made.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The gentleman has made no mistake. He is going to lay his cards on the table and tell all about it. He did that with malice aforethought, if you may call it malice. It is the only thing that we can do at the present time, and it is the only reason that I am inflicting you for one hour here this afternoon in order to explain the provisions of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. It brings the matter in here somewhat like a bill under the suspension of the rules, where we can not change it.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The parliamentary situation on the bill is this: I consulted with certain members of the Committee on Claims of the Senate, and I presented them this complete bill. They were at first rather favorably struck with the provisions of the bill. A little later on they began to hedge. They thought it was going too far; they got cold feet; they did not think that they could put it through the Senate; they thought there were too many over there who were wedded to the old idea that the king could do no wrong. They would not take the time or the trouble to explain to the Members of the Senate. I have been trying to do that to individual Senators for the last several weeks, and I have found nothing but encouragement. Consequently I had to take the Senate bill, which was only a part of my bill, and would have to be amended anyway very considerably in order to safeguard the Government. I took the Senate bill and substituted the Underhill bill by the unanimous vote of my committee. I have something concrete. I have something substantial and far better than anything which the Senate has put out. As much as I would like to have the credit, if there is any credit, and have my name attached to this bill, I am willing to sacrifice whatever honor there may be in that; it matters not whether this bill is known as the Underhill bill or as a Senate bill, just as long as we get some relief from this intolerable situation in Congress and elsewhere throughout the country. I should like to spend the rest of my time in going through some of the cases that I have here. I have one case that has passed five different Congresses, one branch or the other, and has failed of passage in both branches, not because it did not have justification but because it was too late; it got caught in the jam; it could not get through; and these claimants have been waiting all of these years for relief for the payment of a debt which the United States owes them. Every Congress has agreed that it is a just claim, and yet it has not become a law. I have other bills here that have come down to us from the Senate. I might present those to you and show their inconsistency, show how one man was given for an identical claim a mere pittance and another was given several thousand dollars. That is not right. We should take these matters where they belong, before a proper court; then we should provide some medium where private citizens may get redress for a personal injury.

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. GILBERT. I commend the gentleman for his effort to relieve this undesirable situation, but the remedy strikes me as unwise, right on the point that the gentleman is discussing. Why deny those of $5,000 and less the right of court action, especially where recovery for human life itself is limited under this bill to $5,000?

Mr. UNDERHILL. That is very simple. If the gentleman had asked me why I did not increase the amount from $5,000 to $10,000 or a larger figure, I could not have answered him; but here the man does not have to go to a court; he does not have to go to expense. He can simply notify the gentleman, say, that he has suffered this injury, and all the gentleman has to do is to call up on the telephone and notify the compensation board, and the compensation board makes an investigation; it has the machinery; it has the men out in the field service; it brings in a certain amount for injury. We have to make an arbitrary limit; we can not do otherwise.

Mr. GILBERT. I do not know that I fully understood the gentleman. He said all claims of $5,000 and less would be referred to the department.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Oh, that is another phase of the bill. That has nothing to do with personal injury; that is only property damage.

Mr. GILBERT. I think a $5,000 claim should have a judicial determination.

Mr. UNDERHILL. It may be possible that the House wants to reduce that amount from $5,000. The Senate bill provides for only $3,000 that the departments may settle. I would a good deal rather trust my case, if I had one, to a department than to be compelled to hire a lawyer to present my case to a court if it was less than $5,000.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I am in thorough sympathy with the gentleman's desire; but as I understand the gentleman, he states that where these cases are put into court they shall be tried without a jury.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. Now, the well-established policy of our country is trial by jury. What reason does the gentleman offer why in this case he is afraid to give the right of trial by jury?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I am simply following the precedent established in the establishment of the Court of Claims, where jury trial was excluded. Now, if you ask me my view as to the limitation, I answer that I would sacrifice and ditch the whole bill before I would allow these claims to go before a jury. The trouble is that people all over the land seem to think that the Government of the United States has got an unlimited supply of money; that it gets it out of a mine somewhere or picks it off the streets; but it comes out of the pockets of the taxpayer. You can not trust to the sympathy and emotions of a jury, and because some fellow makes a pretty sob-stuff speech on a case before them, instead of keeping the amount reasonable they will jack it up because they think this does not hurt anybody because it comes out of the Government.

Mr. CAREW. Judges have control of that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I think subdivision 3 of section 2 limits the amount of recovery for death or injury to $5,000. Would not that answer the gentleman's criticism as to the jury?

Mr. UNDERHILL. We do not put personal damages to the court at all.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yet you limit the amount to be recovered to $5,000.

Mr. UNDERHILL. We have to do that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The jury could not go beyond that.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Why send it to court with the expense of a court trial?

Mr. ELLIS. If the gentleman will yield, does the gentleman preserve the same liberality as to limitation? What is the rule of limitation?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Please ask that of some member of the legal fraternity, but refrain from asking me absolutely technical legal questions. I do not speak the language, and I do not understand exactly what they mean.

Mr. MANLOVE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I will.

Mr. MANLOVE. Does the gentleman place any statute of limitations in the bill? Does it carry any limitation as to period?

Mr. UNDERHILL. It carries several limitations. In the first place, it shortens up the time in which claims can be made for damages.

Mr. MANLOVE. That is as to claims in the future?

Mr. UNDERHILL. The gentleman means, is it retroactive?

Mr. MANLOVE. The bill is not retroactive as far as claims now pending, I understand?

Mr. UNDERHILL. No; we let those take their course.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Is there any objection to permitting an amount under $5,000 to go to the court, give the option of going to the department or have their right in court?

Mr. UNDERHILL. There is no objection, but the bill does not carry this option.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I will.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I desire to see if I get clearly in my mind what I believe is in the mind of the gentleman from Massachusetts. The gentleman wants by this legislation to establish the practice in our system of government of the right of the individual to litigate his claim for damages against the Government. That is one thing.

Mr. UNDERHILL. That is one thing, and it has been done in the establishment of the admiralty court. This extends to the land laws already existing with reference to the sea.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. But you do not want to go too far.

Mr. UNDERHILL. We can not do so.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. This question we are all disposed to ask can be answered by experience and subsequent legislation.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Before I take that up I would ask your attention to what I have here, which is Senate bill 1912, with the report, No. 667.

I do that because I would like to have those who are interested read this report, which goes more into detail than I can go. And then, before I forget it, I want to say two other things. One is to pay a small tribute of recognition to the men, the lawyers, on my committee. You all know I am a layman; but I could not possibly have gotten this bill out and have met with its legal requirements if it had not been for such men as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Box], the ranking man on this side of the House on the committee, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. VINCENT], and other members of the legal fraternity who have given so much time and attention to this matter and so much assistance to me.

The other thing I want to say is that my purpose is to make a case here this afternoon in order that I can get a rule. If you think I have made a case, I want you to help. I can not get a Calendar Wednesday until after the vacation period, until the next session, and it will be a long way to December or January. Then I am fearful that the bill will get into a jam over in the Senate and that we can get nothing. So I want to put my request for a rule before you now, and thus get the bill passed by this body and into conference at an early date.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What provision do you make for refund of excess taxes assessed and paid?

Mr. UNDERHILL. There is nothing of that here. There are several things that might have been included which have not been.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I notice you exclude any claim arising from the assessment of taxes or customs duties.

Mr. UNDERHILL. We excluded that because there is a period of limitation, and we did not want to go beyond that period. We have refused to consider bills this year where the applicant had slept on his rights.

Mr. MONTAGUE. May I ask the gentleman if he or his committee has taken that action?

Mr. UNDERHILL. It is the policy of the committee.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I understood the gentleman to say a while ago that he assumes full responsibility for what has been done by the committee.

Mr. UNDERHILL. No; I said that I could assume that responsibility.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I understood the gentleman to say he had stopped this and that.

Mr. UNDERHILL. No. I said there was too much power lodged in the hands of the chairman.

Mr. MONTAGUE. There are some small tax claims of, say, $250 or $300, excess taxes paid to the Government, similar claims that have heretofore been approved by the Government. There is no way now of getting action with respect to that class of claims if the department disapproves. But we have passed here bills in some cases giving a refund of many millions of excess taxes, while poor people or small business men are absolutely estopped from the exercise of their rights.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I understand the gentleman's indignation is probably justified, but we can not cure all the evils. Let me mention some of the inconsistencies of the present law. The Post Office Department, for example, in the case of a burglary, can settle the accounts of postmasters up to $10,000, but if there happens to be an extra $10 or $50 bill in the till when that post office is robbed, then they have to come to Congress. Yet you appropriate hundreds of millions of dollars for the Post Office Department, but will not let them settle a burglary case in excess of $10,000. The system is wrong.

Mr. MONTAGUE. When double taxes have been paid there is no possible way of relief unless you happen to belong to some enormous concern having millions?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I may say to the gentleman that if you pass this bill the committee will have some time to give to such bills as the gentleman refers to; and if every bill now pending before the committee were covered by this bill, the committee would still have left over 700 bills to consider.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Up to 1919 the Congress never recognized in any case remuneration for a tort committed by an employee of the Government.

Mr. UNDERHILL. No.

Mr. BLANTON. But in the gentleman's bill the gentleman has recognized it as a general proposition that all torts committed by employees of the Government shall be recompensed by the Government?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. That is a new departure of law.

Mr. UNDERHILL. It was until 1919.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it not an unwise policy on which the Government should not embark?

Mr. UNDERHILL. It is unthinkable, an unhappy illustration, and I hate to suggest it, but I know the gentleman's family; I know that he has some fine, bright boys; I know that if a Government truck came down Pennsylvania Avenue and one of those boys happened to come along the sidewalk and the Government truck jumped the curb, because of defective brakes or defective steering gear, and knocked that boy down and injured him so that he would lose a leg or an arm, the gentleman would think that the employees of the Government ought to be made liable, through the Government itself, for the damages inflicted on that boy. [Applause.]

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. UPSHAW. I notice that the time limit of April 6, 1920, the same as the other, applies to personal injuries and death claims. Why is it that a death that occurred one year before, or three, that is just as worthy a claim, should not be included?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I will simply answer the gentleman by saying there has to be some limit.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. What is the number of the report on the bill?

Mr. UNDERHILL. House Report No. 667.

Mr. UPSHAW. Would not the gentleman be willing to put that date back five years?

Mr. UNDERHILL. No. The policy in regard to other similar legislation has been to make it retroactive only for a period of five years. That policy has been followed in this bill.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Has the gentleman made any effort to have hearings before his committee, in order to get a rule to report out this bill?

Mr. UNDERHILL. It is now having its hearing.

Mr. HASTINGS. This is the beginning of it?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes; this is the beginning of it.

Mr. HASTINGS. I want to say to the gentleman that I am in hearty sympathy with the purposes of his bill.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. LOZIER. Is it not true that there is a growing practice to hold the Government responsible for personal injuries and damages of that character, as one of the results of the tendency of our times by which the Government actively and intimately engages in the business of commercial activities?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Of course, that is the answer. It used to be the case years ago, when the sovereign or the king simply had his ordinary kingly duties to perform; but the President of the United States to-day and the Congress go into every phase of our daily life. You take enforcement of prohibition. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] and I agree absolutely on it, but if an agent of the Government, in making a justifiable raid, should be attacked and in defending himself should injure an innocent citizen, it seems to me the Government should recognize that as a part of the expense.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I did not exactly understand the answer the gentleman gave to my colleague from Georgia [Mr. URSHAW]. Did the gentleman mean to say that all claims which originated prior to 1920 are excluded from the operation of this bill?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes; but it does not prevent the gentleman from bringing such a claim before the Committee on Claims later on.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Suppose a bill has been introduced and is already before your committee for a tort committed prior to 1920—

Mr. UNDERHILL. It will not affect that bill at all.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. But it does not come under the operations of your bill?

Mr. UNDERHILL. No. We had to have a limit.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The next to the last section of the bill provides that limitations shall not run against individuals under 18 years of age. In my State of Texas a person is a minor until he is 21 years of age. Why should 18 years be fixed in this bill?

Mr. UNDERHILL. That was in order to protect the minor.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I understand that, but should it not be 21 years instead of 18 years, because, as I say, in Texas a person is a minor until he reaches 21 years of age.

Mr. UNDERHILL. We took the general average.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. It occurs to me it ought to protect all minors.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. One more important question, and I will ask the gentleman a frank question for information. Will the Members of Congress who have introduced bills that have gone to your committee, where a tort occurred prior to 1920, have any opportunity for a hearing at this session of Congress?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I doubt very much whether there will be any opportunity for a hearing, but they will get consideration of their bills.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. When?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I do not know.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I am asking for information.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I can not tell the gentleman that. With 2,000 bills ahead of us it is impossible to tell when any particular bill will be given consideration. The gentlemen, however, can come around to headquarters and ask for that information.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I am coming to headquarters now.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I suggest that the gentleman come around to the office.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Why not tell me now?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Because there are too many bills before us and we can not tell when any particular bill will be reached.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I really want to know whether there is any reason for coming around and bothering you gentlemen.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes; come around and we shall be glad to see you.

Mr. PEERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. PEERY. As I understand, under the provisions of your bill you propose to give authority to the departments to settle claims up to $5,000 in certain cases?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Property damage.

Mr. PEERY. If the department refuses that claim, is there any right of appeal to any other tribunal?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes; you can come back to the Committee on Claims, but I want to say you would not stand much of a show.

Mr. PEERY. Then you are virtually lodging with the department heads the right to refuse a claim, and with no right of appeal?

Mr. UNDERHILL. The policy to-day is this, and let me say that this has been the policy of the Committee on Claims for five years: When a claim is received and a gentleman comes before us and asks for consideration, the first thing we do is to refer it to the department, and they send back a report. We have no way of knowing whether the claim is justifiable or not, and the department sends us a report, and if the report is adverse that bill is usually dead.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The gentleman said that when a Member appears before his committee the bill is then referred to the department?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. How can he get before your committee?

Mr. UNDERHILL. He has not got a chance.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Of course not. I have begged to appear before your committee for five years, but I have not even had the courtesy of a hearing.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Let us be fair.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am fair, but I disapprove the procedure and I must express it.

Mr. UNDERHILL. It is not a matter of courtesy, but it is a condition which exists. If we gave you a hearing we would have to give every Member a hearing.

Mr. MONTAGUE. So the gentleman can not say he gives an opportunity for Members to appear before his committee.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I did not say that.

Mr. MONTAGUE. A while ago the gentleman said that.

Mr. UNDERHILL. No. The gentleman misunderstood me. I said that when a gentleman comes and asks for consideration of his bill, consideration is given to it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. But a gentleman can not come and no consideration is accorded.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Any gentleman can come at any time and ask for the consideration of a bill. If any gentleman will do that, I will give it consideration, but not a hearing.

Mr. BACON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. BACON. The gentleman said that if the department approves a claim it will be dead.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I did not say that. I said that if the department disapproves a claim then the bill is usually dead. However, if the department approves a claim, then we make an examination ourselves, and we may make an adverse report. Then, too, the department often makes an adverse report, and the Bureau of the Budget as well.

Mr. BROWNING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. BROWNING. If the department gives facts in the report which show that the claim has some equity back of it, will not your committee then consider the bill?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Oh, yes.

Mr. BROWNING. Even though the opinion of the department is adverse to the bill?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes. For instance, in a post-office case the department may say it is the policy of the department not to recommend relief in some cases.

The committee says, however, that as the postmaster has no right to hire or fire his help, and as it is shown conclusively that some bookkeeper or some cashier ran away with a lot of money, the committee takes the position that it is absolutely unjust to hold the postmaster, and we do not care what the policy of the Post Office Department may be, we will put in a favorable report, and then the first time the bill reaches the floor somebody gets up and objects.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Did I not understand the chairman of the Committee on Claims the other day to state they did not allow Members of the House to appear before the Committee on Claims?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Oh, no; the gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. KNUTSON. I asked the gentleman if I might appear before the committee, and the gentleman stated they had 1,500 or 1,600 claims, and it was obviously impossible to hear all the Members.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes; and what I particularly said to the gentleman was that this year the chairman had arbitrarily refused to hear former Members of Congress; had refused to allow former Members of Congress to appear before the committee in behalf of claims.

Mr. KNUTSON. I did not hear the gentleman use the word "former."

Mr. BOX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. BOX. I think there has been some misunderstanding here to-day as I have heard this matter discussed. Do not the rules of the Committee on Claims, which are usually followed, require that all these bills shall be referred to a subcommittee and does not the subcommittee hear anybody who has anything to offer?

Mr. UNDERHILL. The subcommittee has full authority over its deliberations.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. May I be allowed to ask the gentleman from Texas a question in the gentleman's time?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. How is a reference to a subcommittee brought about?

Mr. BOX. The rules require that the Member introducing the bill make a written request for its reference. Thereupon it becomes the duty of the chairman to refer it. I think I may say in the presence of the chairman of the committee, with whom I work in harmony, that they do not always get that. There has been some little issue about that between the chairman and myself, but not at all unfriendly. I feel that every man who requests a reference to a subcommittee is entitled to it. I do not agree with the policy that an adverse report by the department damns the claim and I have so expressed myself. The rules require that when the Member interested in a bill makes a written request for the reference of the bill to a subcommittee, such reference be made. In the average case this rule is followed. There has been some complaint of alleged failure to make such reference. But usually the claim is referred to a subcommittee upon written request, I never knew them to deny anybody a hearing. Did the chairman ever know of a subcommittee refusing to grant a hearing?

Mr. UNDERHILL. That is up to the chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. If my friend will allow me a moment—

Mr. UNDERHILL. Let me first clear up this matter. My statement was with reference to the whole committee. If the whole committee should give hearings to one Member, it must give them to another and we would not accomplish anything. May I say just this, gentlemen. The chairman of the committee, perhaps, has been a little arbitrary; perhaps you may think he has been a little hard-boiled; you may think he has been unjust, but the purpose of the chairman was this: It would be impossible for the committee to report 50 per cent or even 25 per cent of these bills. If we put on the calendar many controversial measures, we lose the confidence of the House and of the conscientious objectors in the House; we get nowhere. It is for the purpose of serving the larger number of Members of the House that the chairman has tried to keep off of the calendar such measures as he knew would be objected to, to the extent of exclusion from consideration on the floor of the House.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Following the statement of my colleague from Texas, I would like to ask the chairman, as well as my colleague, When a bill is referred to a subcommittee is the Member who is the author of the bill then notified, so he may appear before that subcommittee?

Mr. UNDERHILL. No, sir.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Then, how does he know when his bill is going to be considered?

Mr. UNDERHILL. He does not know.

Mr. HUDSPETH. No; he does not, and his bill is killed, and he never knows anything about it.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The bill is not killed—

Mr. HUDSPETH. The gentleman from Texas has had eight killed in the last few days, and I did not even know the committee was going to consider them.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The gentleman from Texas has also had eight that have gone through.

Mr. HUDSPETH. No; not a bill up to this good hour that bears the name of the gentleman from Texas has been reported.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The gentleman ought to have better claims.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I have some good ones.

Mr. BOX. Under the regular procedure is it not made the duty of the Member to request a reference to a subcommittee and follow that up and ascertain who has his bill and take whatever steps are necessary to present it to the subcommittee?

Mr. UNDERHILL. It has been the practice of the subcommittees heretofore that if they found they needed further information they have requested the presence of the Member to give the information.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MICHENER). The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri rise?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to say to the gentleman that as I understand it there is a special order to-day, and I also have a conference report which is privileged. I wish the gentleman would defer his request until we get through with these things.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, there is a special order set for this time for the purpose of hearing a contested-election case.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there is a special order and a special rule for to-day, and I would like to ask the gentleman to defer his request until they have been disposed of.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I am aware of that fact; but I want to make a very brief statement on a subject which I consider of some importance, and which relates to agricultural legislation. I hope the gentlemen will grant me this time. It will not displace the special order.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the fact that the gentleman from Missouri does not occupy the floor very much and does not speak unless he has something to say, but I do not think he ought to interfere with the business set aside for to-day. If he will defer his request until after the order of the day has been completed, I think there will be no difficulty in getting the time he wishes.

Mr. CANNON. I will defer my request until later in the afternoon, if the gentleman thinks I can have time then.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman withdraw his request?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that I be given 15 minutes to address the House at the conclusion of the business to be brought before the House by the gentleman from Indiana.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri requests that he be allowed to address the House for 15 minutes at the conclusion of the business to be brought before the House by the gentleman from Indiana. Is there objection?

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, there is a special order, the report of Elections Committee No. 1, and I think the gentleman ought to postpone his request until after that is completed.

Mr. BLANTON. I would like to show the gentleman how unreasonable he is. There is not a quorum here, and if the gentleman from Missouri wants to insist on his right to be heard and have a quorum it would take 30 minutes to get the membership in. He does not resort to that, but has asked to be heard for just 15 minutes.

Mr. WOOD. I think there is no trouble. The special order of the elections case can be disposed of and then the conference report and then the gentleman from Missouri can come in.

Mr. DOWELL. May I inquire if the gentleman can complete his statement in 15 minutes?

Mr. CANNON. I can.

Mr. DOWELL. If the gentleman can conclude in 15 minutes, so far as the special order is concerned, I will not object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is no special order that can take precedence over a unanimous consent.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri may proceed now for 15 minutes.

Mr. MANLOVE. Fifteen minutes from now or taking out the time that has been occupied in this discussion?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

LEGISLATION FOR AGRICULTURAL RELIEF

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, it is now evident that we are on the last lap of this session of Congress. The newspapers report that the gentleman from Ohio, the Speaker; the gentleman from Connecticut, the majority leader; the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations—the great triumvirate of the House—have each in their turn called at the White House and on their return have issued authoritative statements in which they announce that we will be ready to adjourn much sooner than anticipated; that the legislative program is now practically complete, and that, so far as the House is concerned, we are ready to adjourn at most any time, and the sooner the better. Everything has been done that was intended to be done, everybody has been taken care of that was intended to be taken care of, and the powers that be are now ready and willing and anxious and impatient to get away, lest by some mischance the machine slip a cog and we begin to take up unauthorized legislation.

And it is now evident that the one single most important piece of legislation which this session of Congress was expected to consider—

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Who expected that? The gentleman means hoped.

Mr. CANNON. No. The most important piece of legislation which those most interested had a right to expect this Congress to consider—legislation involving some adequate solution of the most vital and most pressing problem before the American people to-day—is either to be stifled in the committee or reported out too late for enactment.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Let me say to the gentleman that the Committee on Agriculture is in session this morning, and we hope to report out a bill some time next week.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Nebraska recognizes at once the legislation to which I refer, although I have said nothing about agriculture. [Laughter.] He concedes it to be the most important problem before the country to-day. [Applause.]

You know it is an old parliamentary trick of the trade—in use almost from the time the First Congress met at New York—under which legislation too important to be ignored—legislation that has been marked for slaughter but which they have not the courage to assassinate openly—is delayed until the end of the session and then at the last minute reported out and placed on the calendar to be lost in the legislative jam always attending the closing days of a long session of Congress.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, if my friend will permit, he has just stated what Mr. Speaker Reed, one of the great Speakers of the House, called the very gentle art of pretending to be for a thing and really being against it.

Mr. CANNON. That expresses it with the preciseness characteristic of the great Speaker.

Mr. MILLER. Let me ask the gentleman if he has introduced any bill or appeared before the Committee on Agriculture and laid down any specific program for agricultural relief?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I have been in constant consultation with the men who are pushing this legislation. I have cooperated in every possible way in the endeavor to bring this matter before this House from the beginning of the session, but it is evident that there has never been any serious intention of taking it up during this Congress.

The coming short session of Congress must necessarily be devoted exclusively to the passage of the supply bills. Any comprehensive legislation requiring extended consideration and debate must be enacted, if enacted at all, at the long session of Congress. So, when adjournment is taken next month, as has already been tentatively agreed upon and announced in the newspapers this morning, the Sixty-ninth Congress, charged as no Congress has been charged, pledged as no Congress has been pledged, to the relief of agriculture, is quitting without a single serious effort to discharge one of the most solemn and binding obligations ever assumed in any political campaign. Lest we forget, lest the lapse of time has so dulled our recollection of the pledges made by the great political parties in the last election, I want to read from the platforms adopted at New York and Chicago and personally indorsed by every Member of the House when his name appeared on his party's ticket. Here is what our friends the Republicans said at Chicago:

In dealing with agriculture the Republican Party recognizes that we are faced with a fundamental national problem.

Mark the phraseology. It does not refer to this great problem as a class problem or a bloc proposition. It does not deplore class legislation, or bloc organization, but the emphatic statement is made that it is a national problem.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I deeply regret that I can not; I have but 15 minutes. I will be glad to answer the gentleman if he will secure additional time for me.

Mr. WOOD. But the gentleman would not have had the 15 minutes if it had not been for me.

Mr. CANNON. As I recall it, I am indebted to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] for that courtesy. [Laughter.]

Here is what the gentleman's party agreed to do for agriculture. Here is his pledge:

We recognize that agricultural activities are struggling with adverse conditions that have brought deep distress, and we pledge the party to take whatever steps are necessary to bring back a balanced condition between agriculture, industry, and labor.

So much for the Republican platform. Now let us turn to the Democratic platform.

For, Mr. Speaker, while the Republican Party has a majority in the House and Senate, and controls the Presidency and is therefore primarily responsible for all legislation and lack of legislation here, at the same time Members on the other side of the House also have a responsibility and a duty to discharge. It is incumbent upon every Democrat who subscribes to the New York platform to cooperate in every possible way in the passage of legislation within the pledge I am about to read. Here is what the Democrats promised. They pledged themselves—to stimulate by every governmental activity the progress of the co-operative marketing movement and the establishment of export marketing corporations.

We did not question whether or not that was economic. We did not say anything about price fixing, or putting the Government in business, but we pledged ourselves without reservation to the establishment of an export marketing corporation—in order that the exportable surplus may not establish the price of the whole crop.

Mr. Speaker, those pledges were not conditional or contingent. They were definite; they were emphatic; they were unequivocal. Both parties promised to place agriculture on a basis of economic equality with industry and labor.

These were the campaign pledges of the two great parties, still unredeemed, when Congress met last fall.

With these pledges before us, let us consider the relative condition of industry, labor, and agriculture when this session of Congress convened in December.

Industry and labor were in the enjoyment of a period of unprecedented prosperity. Industrial production, movements of freight, corporate earnings, and individual incomes in industrial operations were the highest since the close of the war. Labor was receiving the highest wages for the shortest hours ever paid since man was first ordained to earn his bread by the sweat of his brow. In sharp contrast with these favorable conditions, agriculture was in direst distress. Conditions brought on by the postwar deflation, which prostrated agriculture but did not affect industry and labor, continued unabated. Farm products were selling at less than the cost of production. Farm credits were exhausted. Farm taxes were unpaid. Farm lands were being sold every day under the sheriff's hammer. Farmers were being driven into bankruptcy in all parts of the country, and the standard of living on the American farm had been forced down to the irreducible minimum.

Under these highly contrasting conditions, what class of legislation would you naturally expect the House to first take up for consideration when Congress convened—legislation in behalf of prosperous industry, legislation in the interest of contented labor, or legislation for the relief of distressed and despairing agriculture? I think you will agree that any sane and just man would say at once that even without the platform pledges of the two parties, the very nature and exigency of the occasion demanded that Congress proceed to the consideration of agricultural legislation at the earliest opportunity. And yet when Congress convened agriculture was unceremoniously thrust aside and the House settled comfortably down to the discussion of a bill demanded by industry reducing income taxes, when the farmers of the country had not been able to pay running expenses much less accumulate a taxable income for the four years past. So, while agriculture waited, we passed the revenue bill, cutting in half the taxes of wealth and industry, while farm taxes steadily increased. That bill having been disposed of to the entire satisfaction of all who paid taxes on large incomes, agriculture might now again be expected to receive some attention. But again agriculture is elbowed out of the way, and labor comes forward with a demand for needed legislation, which after due consideration we passed by the substantial vote of 381 to 13.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. And in that labor bill the farmers came here and asked that they be protected, but they were turned down with only 13 votes favoring their side of it.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I wish that I could yield to the gentleman, but I regret that I have not the time. Labor and industry have both been taken care of and agriculture has had no attention whatever.

Surely now that both industry and labor have been given all they asked, agriculture is at last to have her long-delayed day in court. But this time the banking industry claims precedence. The banks of the United States reported profits and resources and daily clearings last year hitherto unequalled in this or any other country of the world. But at their suggestion we once more gave agriculture a swift kick in the slats and proceeded to legislate for the benefit of the poor, destitute, and downtrodden bankers of the Nation.

And this morning we are told that we are nearing the end of the session. Outside of routine business, the entire session has thus far been devoted to the interests of industry and labor. You have reduced industry's taxes. You have granted labor's every request. You have given the bankers generous consideration. You have jammed through the House the foreign debt settlements demanded by organized business—nothing for the farmer, but millions for Mussolini. You have completely forgotten the farmer. You have not reduced his taxes. You have not reduced his freight rates. You have not enforced his rights in the packer's decree. You have not reduced the price of fertilizer or the price of any other item entering into his costs of production. You have not reduced the tariff on the necessities of life he must buy. You have not increased the price of farm products. You have not given the farmer a living wage for his labor. You have not made it possible for him to secure an adequate return on his investments in land and equipment. You have not raised the pitiful standard of living on the American farm. You have not carried out your agreement to place him on a plane of equality with labor and industry. In short, you have not kept a single promise you made to the farmers in order to win the last two elections. [Applause.]

Not only have you failed utterly to keep faith with the farmer, but you have treated his representatives with singular discourtesy. Farm representatives have been subjected to flagrant insult and indignity.

Representatives of industry and labor appearing before committees of the House have been received with uniform courtesy. I attended the hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means when Mr. Mellon testified and when the great man appeared in the doorway a spell seemed to fall on all within the room. It was as if a sacred presence had entered. And throughout the hearings he was accorded the greatest deference and respect, a respect he was entitled to receive and which reflected credit on the great committee before which he appeared. The same courtesy and consideration has always been shown the representatives of organized labor when they appeared before committees of the House. But when the representatives of the allied farm organizations appeared in their official capacity to plead the cause of the farmer the atmosphere was that of a police court, and they were examined and cross-examined in much the same manner as a prosecuting attorney would examine a witness for the defense in a murder trial. They were badgered, bulldozed, and browbeaten. They were contemptuously addressed as "You fellows." They were insulted with insinuating questions of, "Who's paying your expenses here?"

Representatives of organized industry and organized labor have always been welcomed by congressional committees and treated with every courtesy and respect, but when representatives of organized agriculture appear before a committee of the House appealing for equal legislative consideration, promised in every party platform adopted in the last campaign, they are accused of threats and intimidation and are met with opprobrious epithets and referred to as "cheap skates."

Permit me to call to the attention of those who approve such methods to a very pertinent precedent, an historic incident which deserves to become a classic. Representatives of the farm organizations in one of our Northern States some time ago went down to the State capital to petition the legislature then in session for legislative relief indorsed by the farmers of the State. After listening impatiently to argument advanced by the farmers in behalf of their bill the committee before which they were appearing abruptly concluded the hearings by telling them, in much the same spirit that has been manifested here, to go home and sloop their hogs. The farmers obediently took the next train home. But at the next election they went to the polls and kicked both the hogs and the sloop out of the State legislature.

Mr. Speaker, when we consider the desperate plight of the farmer and note the fulsome promises made by all parties at each recurring election, promises which no attempt is ever made to fulfill, we wonder at the cause of this apathy on the part of Congress in matters in which the farmers' interest is concerned. It is seldom that the real reason is acknowledged, but in an editorial appearing in one of the Washington papers last night, or the night before, one version of it is set forth in brazen effrontery. The editorial is, in part, as follows:

A Senate committee, after five years of intermittent inquiry and deliberation, is about ready to submit to Congress a farm relief bill.

That is important news.

It is, perhaps, even more important to you, the city dweller, than to the farmer.

Your nearest connection with a cow may be the milk bottle deposited each morning on your doorstep, and your chief grain problem may be nothing more than the necessity of deciding whether the contents thereof shall be poured upon corn flakes or cream of wheat. You will do well, however, to watch what the Senate committee proposes.

Under present conditions there is only one way for Congress to relieve the farmer, and that is to make it possible for the farmer to collect more money from you for what he produces.

The Washington politicians are loath to say this in so many words. They talk loudly of how the surplus of farm produce shall be removed from domestic markets, but their articulation is subdued when they contemplate the logical conclusion that the surplus must be removed so that domestic prices may be increased.

In the long run, any extra money given the farmer will come from the consumer's pocket.

Here is an editorial to make an honest man's blood boil. Here is an editorial writer and those whom he represents, who deny that "the laborer is worthy of his hire," and who are willing to adopt the methods of the highwayman and take from the farmer without pay because of his necessity the fruits and products of his honest toil.

The writer of this article is willing to act as a recipient of stolen goods. He wants something for nothing. So far as he is concerned, men may toil and sacrifice from dawn till dusk without recompense. Farm women may labor barefooted in the open fields. Farm children may go without education and without sufficient winter clothing. He is willing to take from them the products of their service and their tears and their sacrifice that he may live in unearned luxury and ease at their expense.

I can not believe that this man is the typical American or that his is the typical American viewpoint. I know it is not the position of labor. I trust it is not the position of industry. And I sincerely hope that before the rapidly approaching end of this session we can demonstrate that it is not the attitude of this House.

There is yet time to do something for agriculture. Late as it is, it is not too late to keep faith with the farmer. It is not absolutely necessary to adjourn by the 1st of June. Congress has in former years sat as late as October, even in election years. The farmers of the country would much rather have us stay here all summer, if that is necessary, and give them such legislative relief as we can, than to have us back home with our arms around their necks telling them how much we think of them and how much we sympathize with them and how much we are going to do for them if they will just send us back to Congress.

But if we are to adjourn and we do go home empty handed let me proceed right here to do a little threatening and a little intimidating on my own account. The farmers of the country are fed up on political apple sauce. They have had enough of promises that are never kept, and platform pledges that are never remembered after the votes are counted on election day. The farmers and the farm organizations at last are demanding a show-down. It is pay day with them. And if there is any significance in the signs of the times, either they are going to hear from this House at this session of Congress, or this House is going to hear from them at the coming election.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

SIROVICH AGAINST PERLMAN

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MICHENER). For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. COLTON. For the purpose of calling up the report on the contested-election case of Sirovich against Perlman reported from Committee on Elections No. 1. I ask for the consideration of the resolution submitted in that case.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Utah calls up for consideration the report of the Committee on Elections in the case of Sirovich against Perlman. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That William I. Sirovich was not elected a Representative from the fourteenth congressional district of the State of New York and is not entitled to a seat herein.

Resolved, That Nathan D. Perlman was duly elected a Representative from the fourteenth district of the State of New York and is entitled to retain a seat herein.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, I just want to take a moment of the time of the House to express appreciation for the conscientious work done by the members of the committee in this case. It has been my pleasure for a number of years to work on this committee with the ranking Member of the minority, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUDSPETH]; and, of course, I know, as all Members of the House know, you could not find a more fair, conscientious man than he. [Applause.] I can say that also, Mr. Speaker, with reference to the other members of the committee. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ESlick] has given very thorough and careful consideration to this case. He has spent a great deal of time in studying the case. I could mention each one of the members of the committee on both sides of the House. They have given painstaking care to every phase of this case. It has been a judicial question with the committee entirely. Partisan politics has had no consideration whatever. The case was considered on the facts which were presented to the committee and the law governing such cases, and we have come to the conclusion that this resolution ought to be adopted as the only fair way of settling the case. We ask that the resolution be adopted. I now yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUDSPETH].

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, this is a contest different from the ordinary one that comes before the Congress. In this contest the contestant did not ask that he be given the seat in the fourteenth congressional district. He did not ask that the committee seat him, Doctor Sirovich, but his prayer was that the seat now held by Mr. Perlman be declared vacant and void and another election held. As stated by the chairman of the committee, the committee patiently heard the arguments of counsel for contestant and contestee. I think every member of the committee read the voluminous testimony taken in the proceedings held in New York City. I want to state to you frankly, Mr. Speaker, the case was not properly prepared before it was presented to the committee of Congress. I think every man on that committee will agree to that, and counsel for the contestant asked for additional time to produce additional testimony, but under the rules governing contested-election cases and the law it could not be granted. My distinguished colleague from Tennessee, Judge ESlick, looked up the precedents as to right of reopening and presented them to the committee, and his judgment was adopted as the unanimous judgment of the committee, and I want to say in passing in the eight years I have served on Elections Committees and six years upon this committee I have never seen partisanship creep into that committee but one time.

I warned you gentlemen at that time, and I made a prophecy that it would destroy the Republican organization in that district, and I predicted that you would not have the temerity to put up a man for Congress thereafter, and you never have had a candidate in the Winchester district of Virginia. You can not afford to deal with these matters in that way, and you can not afford to take away a man's seat from him by partisanship. Every man on the committee, Democrat or Republican, should try an election case as a judge would try a case on the bench, according to the law and the evidence solely. When you took TOM HARRISON's seat away from him you destroyed your organization in that district. You did violence to your conscience and thwarted the will of the electorate as fairly expressed in that district, and you knew it when you did it.

In this case, however, there has not been any partisanship, and there has not been any partisanship in the committee since the distinguished gentleman from Utah became chairman of that committee. [Applause.] A Democrat was seated the last time over a Republican by this committee, and every member of the committee voted to seat that Democrat. That is the way to try election cases. If you tried all such cases that way, there would not be so many ill-founded cases coming before Congress.

Now, gentlemen, you can take the testimony here, and if I wanted to act the part of a demagogue I might besmirch the character of the gentleman who holds this seat on the testimony of a self-confessed criminal, a burglar, and a crook; but I would not resort to that, and you would not have any respect for me if I did, and I certainly would have no respect for myself. That is the kind of testimony we had, and I would not base an adverse report on it; neither would my colleagues. There were irregularities in that contest, certainly, that should not have occurred. But, gentlemen, if you take every vote that Mr. Stump, the contestant's attorney, said was doubtful and gave it to Doctor Sirovich it would not elect him.

There was one ballot box where there was a recount, and it was found that a certain man, George Raskin, had been put there as a tally clerk and that he had served 15 years on an indictment for burglary; and at another voting box one Lewis, a notorious crook, performed. Raskin said he had taken votes from Mr. Sirovich and counted them for Mr. Perlman. But if you would take those votes and count them for Mr. Sirovich he still would not have enough votes to elect him. This committee felt that it would not lower the dignity of this House and accept testimony of such disreputable characters.

But I do want to say in passing that men like that should not be put on election boards in New York in the future, and I am sure the gentleman from Utah [Mr. COLTON] fully agrees with me. We could not afford to take that kind of testimony and bring it in here either as a minority report or as a majority report. If we had done so, we would not be worthy of your confidence. Hence, this report comes to you to-day. My views herein expressed represents the view of Judge ESlick, and also I understand is the view of Mr. CHAPMAN, the other members of the committee on the minority side. We decline to join in the majority report, but decline to make a minority report, for there is not sufficient evidence to justify one. As far as the personnel of Elections Committee No. 1 is concerned, you can rest assured that cases will be considered from a judicial standpoint, and I trust this atmosphere will ever permeate it in the future.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MICHENER). The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR PENSIONS

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House bill 8132, which is the Spanish War pension bill, with Senate amendments, and agree to same.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8132) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the war with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, or the China relief expedition, to certain named soldiers, to certain widows, minor children, and helpless children of such soldiers and sailors, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman should give us some explanation of what the Senate amendment is.

Mr. KNUTSON. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I understood the gentleman this morning to say he desired to go to conference.

Mr. KNUTSON. That was the intention, I will say to the distinguished minority leader; but afterwards we received a letter and telegram from the commander in chief of the Spanish-American War veterans, asking us to concur in the Senate amendments, because he was afraid if it went to conference and had to again be passed upon by both Houses it would jeopardize the bill. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. UPSHAW], the ranking minority member of the committee, was informed of the present plan and approves of it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. We would like to know something of the amendments.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The gentleman talks about the commander in chief of the Spanish-American War veterans. It is not his responsibility. It is our responsibility. Why not have the Senate amendments put in the RECORD and take this up to-morrow? We shall not lose any time. The gentleman knows that I am just as strong for this bill as the gentleman is. We ought not to adopt legislation in this hasty manner simply because of a telegram from the commander and the consent of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. UPSHAW].

Mr. KNUTSON. I will be glad to have the Senate amendments printed in the RECORD and call the bill up to-morrow.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The gentleman should ask unanimous consent.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments of the Senate be inserted in the RECORD and also the telegram.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the Senate amendments be printed in the Record and the telegram included. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendments, explanation of same, and the telegram referred to are as follows:

Changes made in House bill by the Senate are as follows:

1. Senate struck out the automatic increase clause in the House bill and added a new section (section 4) that may automatically increase the pensions. I can not state for sure whether it does. Open for construction.

2. Reduced the rate for additional pensions for minor children from $8 to $6 per month. No other change in rates.

3. House bill proposed to bring the date of marriage down to the present day. Senate changed the same and gives title to widows if they were married to the soldier prior to September 1, 1922.

4. House bill proposed to commence increases in pensions from date of filing application for increase. Senate leaves the law as it is, so the increase will commence from date of medical examination.

5. House bill provided in widows cases, where the soldier dies subsequent to the approval of the bill, that the widow's pension should commence from date of the soldier's death. Senate changed this and makes widow's pension commence from date of filing application.

6. Remarried widows. House bill gave remarried widows title if the subsequent marriages were dissolved by death of the husbands or divorce without fault on the part of the wife. Senate amendment gives title if the divorce was not on the ground of adultery on the part of the wife. In other words, the wife may be at fault, but as long as she is not guilty of adultery she can be granted a remarried widow's pension.

7. House bill, in section 4, provided that no soldier, sailor, or marine, as described in the bill, who is in a hospital or institution under the control of the Government should have deducted from his pension any part of same for the benefit of any home or hospital fund. Senate leaves this provision out entirely.

SEC. 3. Any soldier, sailor, or marine or nurse now on the pension roll or who may be hereafter entitled to a pension under the act of June 5, 1920, or under that act as amended by the act of September 1, 1922, or under this act on account of his service during the war with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, or China relief expedition, who is now or hereafter may become, on account of age or physical or mental disabilities, helpless or blind, or so nearly helpless or blind as to need or require the regular aid and attendance of another person, shall be given a rate of $72 a month, provided such disabilities are not the result of his or her own vicious habits: And provided further, That no one while an inmate of the United States Soldiers' Home or of any national or State soldiers' home shall be paid more than $50 per month under this act.

CHICAGO, ILL., April 15, 1926.

HAROLD KNUTSON, M. C.,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

On behalf of the United Spanish War Veterans I earnestly request our friends in the House to concur in the Senate amendments to H. R.

8132, which passed the Senate April 14. I appreciate that the measure as passed by the House was superior in its administrative features, but my comrades and their widows and orphans do not wish to jeopardize the measure by the delay necessary for a conference report and the necessity of passage by both House and the Senate again. Have Senate bill passed by House at earliest moment.

CARMI A. THOMPSON,
Commander in Chief.

SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR PENSIONS

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Indiana yield to me for a moment before taking up the consideration of the conference report?

Mr. WOOD. I will.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I would like the attention of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUSTSON]. I want to suggest to the gentleman that he prepare a brief statement in connection with this Spanish War veterans' pension bill to go in the Record in connection with the matter which he has already inserted, showing just what these amendments are, so that we may know definitely to-morrow, when we take it up for action, what they are.

Mr. KNUSTSON. May I say to the gentleman that my attention has just been called to the fact that all the amendments made by the Senate are in yesterday's Record.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. But the Senate struck out the whole bill, did it not?

Mr. KNUTSON. Well, if I may take just a moment, the bill H. R. 8132 was introduced subsequently by the chairman of the Pension Committee in the Senate and they struck out section 4, which had to do with maimed soldiers; then the committee took up the bill that the Senator had introduced, which was similar to the House bill, and they made three changes, one of which reduced the age of minor children from 18 to 16—the pensionable age, the gentleman will understand—and the amount that such minors were to receive from $8 per month to $6 per month.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Why would it not be a good idea to have the Senate bill and the amendments printed in the RECORD?

Mr. KNUTSON. That is what we have.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is already in the RECORD.

Mr. UNDERHILL. With the amendments?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Printed in bill form?

Mr. KNUTSON. It is going to be printed in to-day's RECORD, so that Members may see it to-morrow, and the Senate bill is in yesterday's RECORD. Unfortunately there are no available copies of the Senate bill.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Then it ought to be printed for use in the document room.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. In that connection the House will be interested in reading page 7433 of yesterday's RECORD, wherein it appears that the Senate was laboring under the impression when they passed the bill that it was the same as the House bill, and I think if gentlemen of the House will read that page of the RECORD they will find it is important that this bill go to conference.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The idea I had in mind was that this bill ought to be printed in order to supply the demand that is being made all the time on Members for copies of the bill, and the bill is not available in the document room.

Mr. KNUTSON. The chairman of the committee will insert in to-day's RECORD a statement showing what the Senate changes are.

Mr. UNDERHILL. That does not give me what I want. What I want are copies of the bill in the document room available for Members when they have demands for them.

Mr. KNUTSON. Let me say to the gentleman that the bill as passed by the Senate is in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 14 in its entirety. I do not see why it is not possible to read the bill as it appears in the RECORD. I shall be glad to follow the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee and would rather not take any more time, because I have already intruded on the gentleman from Indiana.

CONFERENCE REPORT—INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL, 1927

Mr. WOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDLIN] whether he wants to use any time.

Mr. SANDLIN. I would like to use some time; yes.

Mr. WOOD. Well, we have an hour between us. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I should like to have as much as 10 minutes if it is agreeable to the gentleman.

Mr. WOOD. How much more time does the gentleman want?

Mr. SANDLIN. Ten more minutes.

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman refers now to the report and not to the committee amendments?

Mr. WOOD. Yes. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDUFFIE].

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I regret to trespass upon your time, yet I can but feel that attention should be again directed with all possible force to this conference report as to the amendments 18 and 19 dealing with appropriations for the Emergency Fleet Corporation.

Of course, I realize that I am now conducting a post-mortem examination, and this matter is more or less water that has passed under the mill. The majority party has expressed itself. We fought this question out a week or ten days ago. It was then decided and determined by the majority party, those responsible for legislation here, that the amendment of the House, which provided necessary funds, according to the evidence of all of those charged with the responsibility of the merchant marine, should be stricken out and some arbitrary figures of $13,900,000 inserted.

The testimony showed that $18,691,000 was needed to properly maintain our merchant marine. The House adopted those figures and amended the bill by increasing the Budget figures approximately $5,000,000, but the Senate reduce the amount to the arbitrary figures of $13,900,000. I think everybody admits, unless it be the chairman of the Appropriations Committee [Mr. MADDEN], under whose active and hectic leadership the House refused to insist upon its $18,000,000 provision, that $13,900,000 will not maintain the Shipping Board activities during the next fiscal year. No one has yet in all the discussion of this subject informed this House how the figures $13,900,000 were arrived at. No one knows to-day.

You gentlemen claim to be friendly to the American merchant marine, but your treatment of it denies your claims. The people of the great wheat-growing sections know what it means to have ships available to move their crops to world markets.

Of course, it has cost money to keep our flag on the seas, but all agree that it is money well spent. Indeed, the amounts appropriated from the Public Treasury for this purpose has been returned many fold in reduced freight rates to the American shipper. We are just beginning, after years of handicaps, to make a fair showing. Our competitors are claiming we are going out of business. The American people do not wish to pull down our merchant flag. Every man in this House knows that. Yet this very report, this very act of Congress indicates that you are choking and killing the merchant marine. Something is wrong somewhere. This administration is either grossly ignorant of conditions or it is grossly indifferent to them.

The country ought to know where the responsibility lies and it ought to be informed as to the real reasons for cutting this appropriation to almost half the amount provided for the present year—that is, from $24,000,000 to $13,900,000.

I do not think anybody will gainsay the proposition that one of the most important activities of the Government to-day is the building up of its foreign commerce as well as its national defense through the maintenance of its merchant flag upon the high seas. Gentlemen on that side of the aisle profess much faith in the merchant marine. They say, "We are going to see to it that money is provided"; at the same time they are withdrawing the money absolutely necessary for its existence, and under the whip and spur of the leadership of this House the majority side has refused to provide funds enough to operate the ships under our flag during the next year.

Oh, you say, "If this is not enough, come back, prove it is not enough, and we will consider a deficiency appropriation." We were astounded to find the chairman of the great Appropriations Committee, in valiantly defending his Budget figures, absolutely advocating a deficiency appropriation! Why, I ask, should he do that in this case? Why single out the merchant marine for such treatment? He does not do that with other departments. Is it the Budget or the merchant marine he is interested in? Somehow or other, $13,900,000 fit into the scheme of things in making up the Budget by the Budget officer, and without rhyme or reason you have said, "We will adhere to these figures and if you need more money come back later."

This is out of the ordinary, to say the least, and you have only camouflaged by the additional provision in amendment 19 that $10,000,000 is to be available for the use of the Shipping Board in keeping up the service of those ships which have been sold by the board and which may be turned back after failure to operate them by private enterprise. More than that, the President has been given the authority, and a most unusual authority, entirely out of the ordinary when it comes to the average appropriation bill, to supervise the expenditure from this fund. Not a dollar of it can be used without his approval, which means that unless the President really has his heart in the merchant marine very little or none of this money will ever be used for that particular purpose.

Gentlemen on this side of the aisle and some gentlemen on the Republican side of the aisle thought they might take $5,000,000 of the $10,000,000 and add it to the $13,900,000 and have ample funds to operate. This would not have increased the Budget figures, but somehow this did not please the powers that be and the $13,900,000 figures must stand as the edict of this Congress, which means you do not wish to encourage the merchant marine. All the testimony shows, notwithstanding the chairman of the Appropriations Committee—and I do not think even the gentleman from Indiana, whose heart, I believe, is really in this proposition, would deny it—that the amount carried in the bill as now presented is not a sufficient fund.

I want the country to know that those who are professing to be friendly, you on the Republican side who would pretend to uphold the hands of the merchant marine by your words, are, by your acts, absolutely cutting its throat, or smothering it to death. You are going to find that this amount of money will not carry on this great and important governmental activity. I think the American people ought to know where the responsibility is. Some of us, practically all on this side of the also, have insisted that you provide ample funds for the Shipping Board. You have failed to do it, and within the next six months, when the activities of the shipping service are likely to be curtailed throughout the country, let it be understood where the responsibility rests for this slow-death process you are applying to our merchant marine.

The chairman of the Shipping Board, of course, says, "We will get along the best we can." He would say nothing else; he could say nothing else. Indeed, one member of the Shipping Board dared to suggest to the Committee on Appropriations at the other end of the Capitol that $13,900,000 was not enough, and he was confronted with the suggestion he was acting contrary to the Budget law in that he dared make such a suggestion to that committee. Why have a Congress here if the Budget is going to do our legislating for the country? The Shipping Board, of course, is going to do the best they can, but we all know they will not and can not expand the service, nor with these limited funds can they maintain the merchant marine in as full vigor as was intended by the law. The Shipping Board and the president of the Fleet Corporation both realize their funds have been so cut down that such can not be done. Everyone knows they will try to stay within the amounts you have provided. They will feel their hands are tied, and therefore I say you are to-day crippling and strangling to death the shipping service of the American people.

I wish to express my opposition to a conference report that accedes to a policy of this administration which, if pursued, will drive our flag from every sea, just as all the enemies of the merchant marine are trying to do. [Applause.]

TRADING WITH THE ENEMY ACT

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TILSON). The Chair lays before the House a request of the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That the House of Representatives be requested to return to the Senate its message announcing its agreement to the conference report on the bill (S. 1226) entitled "An act to amend the trading with the enemy act."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senate?

There was no objection.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDLIN].

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, as a member of this conference committee I could not agree to the action taken by the Senate on this item. While I realize it is futile to discuss the matter at this time, I want to say I thoroughly agree with the remarks made on this question by the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDUFFIE].

I am afraid that many Members of this House who have not studied this question do not realize the importance of the matter. I come from a section of the country that the merchant marine has meant a great deal to, especially in the shipment of its cotton. I realize that two years ago, when there was a congestion of wheat at the southern ports, if it had not been for the activities of the vessels of the Shipping Board the wheat farmers of this country would have suffered a very great loss.

It matters not from what section of the country the Members come, they are necessarily interested in this activity of the Government.

Then I am opposed to this method of appropriation. It is not reasonable or practicable. This action is not taken in any other department of the Government. Suppose the Post Office Department should come and ask for $700,000,000, and the Appropriations Committee should say, "We will give you $400,000,000, and then next fall we will in a deficiency bill allow you enough to run the Post Office Department." The same thing would apply to the War Department and every other activity of the Government. There is no man connected with the Shipping Board or the Emergency Fleet Corporation but that does not know that this amount is not enough to operate the ships now operated by the Emergency Fleet Corporation. They say next fall we will take care of it in the deficiency bill. In my opinion one of the great causes why this activity of the Government has not prospered before is because the American people realize that this Government has no fixed policy in regard to this activity.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDLIN. I will.

Mr. DAVIS. With respect to sentiment of the American people, I wish to call attention to the fact that the platforms of both great political parties declared in favor of continuing the Shipping Board's trade routes until they could be sold, and sold to private interests with an assurance that they would continue to be operated under the American flag. These planks in both platforms were adopted at the great conventions without opposition.

Mr. SANDLIN. I thank the gentleman for his contribution. I want to say in conclusion that I hope the Appropriations Committee this year, when this matter is brought before them asking for a deficiency, which certainly will be done, will carry out their promise and give the Emergency Fleet Corporation and the Shipping Board the money they need to operate the ships so necessary to our trade. [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the committee, I think we have reason to congratulate ourselves and the members of this committee that this bill, which has given more trouble than any other appropriation bill heretofore, has passed this House and the Senate this year with less friction than in all the years since the adoption of the Budget. I wish to thank gentlemen both on the Democratic and Republican sides for their cooperation in making that thing possible.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the speech of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDUFFIE] with reference to the action of the Senate in reducing the appropriation made by the House on his amendment to cover the losses of operation. I wish now to say, in all fairness to this House, that it may be that the $13,900,000 appropriated will not be sufficient. I hope that it will be. Some things have transpired within the last few days that may make that possible. Whatever confusion has resulted in consequence of the estimates made by the Budget added to that of those who were supposed to know what the necessary amounts should be in the activity itself. The former president of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, in whom I have had great confidence, and of whom I have spoken with great deference on the floor many a time, thought that $13,900,000 would be sufficient, in view of the fact that they have in contemplation the disposal of some of these lines and have disposed of them in this manner. Possibly the lines that were disposed of this week will come back into the hands of the Emergency Fleet Corporation. If I had my way about it the vessels disposed of never would have gone out of our hands under the circumstances.

In my opinion—and I say it with the greatest deference to the judgment of those who differ from me—in my opinion that is the worst blow that has been administered to the merchant marine by the Shipping Board, in which we have placed our dependence. They sold five passenger vessels in the Oriental Line, plying between the United States and the Orient, to the Dollar Line for an aggregate amount of $4,500,000. Each one of these vessels cost more in its building than the sum total for the entire lot. They were not built during the war crises; they were built after the war for the purpose of carrying the trade of the United States to the Orient in our hope to extend that trade.

The merchant marine and fisheries act, section 7, provides that when disposal shall be made of these vessels they shall be disposed of, all things being equal, to those who are responsible and to those who are interested in the locality in maintaining a merchant marine from that locality. That is the substance, not the letter, of the provision of that section. In my opinion that law has been violated not only in spirit but in letter.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Is there any agreement on the part of the Dollar Line to continue the operation of these vessels to the Far East, or is that entirely problematical?

Mr. WOOD. Yes, there is an agreement, and the agreement was written by the Dollars themselves, and that is the unfortunate thing about it.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. For a brief question.

Mr. BEGG. Is it not a fact that the Dollar bid was according to the law in every respect, and $500,000 higher than the next highest bid?

Mr. WOOD. Let me tell you all about the Dollar bid. They submitted some bids some few weeks ago, when they were bidding $600,000 for each of these vessels instead of $900,000, which bids were rejected. Then a new advertisement was made, based on the specifications, the items of which were furnished by the Dollars, where there were two bidders, one of them the Dollars and the other a stool pigeon of the Dollars, a man named Alexander. It is not so much what these vessels bring, as what the consequence to the United States in the future may be. This transaction gives a monopoly to the Dollars, a thing that should not be. The Dollars are not so patriotic that they would give up their substance to the United States. It is one of the biggest shipping lines in the world, and one of the most selfish, if the facts that I have are true. They were not flying the American flag before the war. They were sailing under the British flag, and I will tell you what they have got now. They have three lines, one of them from San Francisco to the Orient, one of them, so far as freight is concerned, from British Columbia to the Orient, and now they will have the passenger traffic from Seattle to the Orient under a contract whereby they may transfer one or more of these vessels at any time and there are five of them. They are obligated to make 17 terminals and they may make them and yet absolutely destroy this line from Seattle to the Orient. All this has been done in protest from every responsible consideration. It was done against the protest of Captain Crowley who is president of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, who has studied this thing from the beginning to end, and in view of the responsibility imposed upon him he has advised against it. I am going to set his report out in the Record so that the whole country may know what has been done.

APRIL 12, 1926.

From: President, Fleet Corporation.
To: United States Shipping Board.
Subject: American Oriental Mail Line.

The Shipping Board at a meeting on April 6, 1926, referred to the president of the Fleet Corporation bids received on that date for the sale of the American Oriental Mail Line, consisting of the following vessels and prices received:

Name of bidder	Vessels (steamships)	Amount
W. B. Keene, for and on behalf of a proposed corporation.	President Grant.....	$800,000
	President Jackson.....	800,000
	President Jefferson.....	800,000
	President McKinley.....	800,000
	President Madison.....	800,000
Admiral Oriental Line.....	President Madison.....	900,000
	President Jackson.....	900,000
	President McKinley.....	900,000
	President Jefferson.....	900,000
	President Grant.....	900,000

The Fleet Corporation called for bids for the sale of this line and designated the time for the reception of bids to be March 15, 1926. On March 16, 1926, the board was advised that no bids were received, but a preliminary discussion was had with Mr. R. Stanley Dollar, of the Admiral Oriental Line, at which time a number of changes were suggested by him in the proposed contract. The changes requested by Mr. Dollar were outlined in my memorandum of March 22, 1926, and the Shipping Board on March 23, 1926, considered the changes requested by the Admiral Oriental Line, which are as follows:

1. Terms of payment: The original form of contract used in advertising this line specified $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of the purchase price to accompany the bid and a further $22\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of the purchase price of each vessel in cash upon delivery thereof. The revised form of contract provides for $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of the purchase price to accompany the bid and a further $22\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of the purchase price of each vessel in cash upon delivery, or by an irrevocable letter of credit payable within two years from date thereof, together with interest thereon at the rate of $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent per annum, payable annually.

2. Service: The original form of contract provided for a minimum of 17 round voyages per year, and the service to be maintained between the ports of Seattle, Wash., and Manila, P. I., calling each way at a port or ports in both Japan and China. The amended contract provides for a minimum of 17 round voyages per annum and that the buyer may, upon application to and approval by the Shipping Board, divert one or more of the vessels to another service operating under the American flag, but in the case of the vessels calling at Portland, Oreg., they will not be allowed to ship freight from that port in competition with the freight service maintained by the board.

3. Liquidated damages: The original contract provides, in addition to surrendering the vessels, for the buyer to pay to the seller the sum of $1,000,000 during the first two years of the five-year period in the event of default in maintaining the service; the sum of $800,000 in case such default happens during the third year of said five-year period; the sum of $600,000 in case such default happens during the fourth year of the said five-year period; and $400,000 in case such default happens during the fifth year, these sums to be paid as liquidated damages. The new and last form of contract used in advertising the line for sale eliminates entirely the liquidated damages, but does provide in case of default for the purchaser to surrender the actual possession of all vessels immediately upon written demand of the seller, and all sums paid by the buyer to the seller on the purchase price prior to such default shall remain the property of the seller.

The Shipping Board, on March 23, 1926, directed the Fleet Corporation to modify the form of contract in accordance with the above and to readvertise the line and obtain bids for the purchase of the same at the earliest possible moment. The Fleet Corporation accordingly read-vertised the line for sale and called for bids to be opened in Washington at noon on April 6, 1926.

The bid of W. B. Keene is in the sum of $800,000 for each of the five vessels, or a total of $4,000,000. The bid is entered on behalf of a corporation to be organized within 90 days, which corporation will have a paid-in capital of not less than $2,000,000; controlling interest of the capital stock of the corporation to be owned by American citizens and the good-faith deposit submitted with the bid to be retained as liquidated damages in the event of award and the failure by the bidder to comply with any of such provisions.

This bid also contemplates a modification of the form of sales agreement issued as a basis for bidding, to the extent required under paragraph 5 thereof, in order to give the buyer the option of accepting the vessels as soon as practicable after their arrival and discharge at Seattle, after the elapse of the 90-day period stipulated as the time within which the purchasing corporation will be formed.

The bid of W. B. Keene does not make any claim for preference under the provisions of section 7, merchant marine act, 1920; does not contain any financial statement of the proposed purchasing corporation beyond the announced intention of having a paid-in capital of $2,000,000, and does not give any statement of organization of the bidder beyond the fact that Mr. Keene has arranged to establish his residence in Seattle. There is, however, a letter dated April 9, 1926, which Mr. Keene has submitted subsequently to the opening of the bids in which he has given his intentions as to the financial backing, organization, service, and terms of payment. It is impossible, therefore, to give any consideration to "the ability of such persons to maintain the service desired and proposed to be maintained" as provided for under section 7 in determining which bidders, if any, have the support, financial and otherwise, of the domestic communities primarily interested.

The bid of the Admiral Oriental Line is in the sum of $900,000 per ship, a total of $4,500,000 for the five vessels, or $500,000 more than the bid of W. B. Keene. The bid of the Admiral Oriental Line is submitted on the identical form provided under the basis of bidding and does not contain any variations from the terms and conditions issued as a basis for bidding. An accompanying letter calls attention to the fact that the list of spare parts attached to the invitation is not, in the judgment of the bidder, an accurate statement of such items, and a schedule is furnished designed to show the spare parts which the bidder says are available and that should go to the successful purchaser which spare parts, according to our records, do not all belong to these particular vessels. The spare parts as listed in the contract in the invitation for bids are the ones, according to our records, that should go with the service. The remainder of the list submitted by the Admiral Oriental Line comprise our storeroom stock and can be used in the service of the United States lines or a part may be sold to the purchaser, but separate from the price paid for the ships.

The bid of the Admiral Oriental Line claims preference under the provisions of section 7, merchant marine act, on the theory that the bidder is a citizen of the United States having the support, financial and otherwise, of the domestic communities; that the bidder possesses the organization and ability to maintain the service desired and proposed to be maintained; and that the bidder, in its judgment, has contributed to some degree in the maintenance of the existing service by its operations thereof. The bidder submits a financial statement, as required by the invitation, consisting of a balance sheet as of February 28, 1926. The Treasurer desires to defer the expression of an opinion on this balance sheet until further information is obtained as to the principal asset items shown thereon, namely, cash and securities, $935,816.40.

While the board is free to change its policy from time to time, I do not feel that the new form of contract, approved by the board on March 23, 1926, properly protects the Government or the service nor do I feel that it is fair to other purchasers of board tonnage, particularly the Munson Steamship Co., which purchased the Pan American Line under a contract much more satisfactory from our point of view.

I consider the American Oriental Mail Line on a much more paying basis to-day than the Pan American Line when sold, and I know of no condition on the west coast which would justify making the terms more lenient than those in the contract of sale of the Pan American Line. I feel that in case this line were sold under the terms now prescribed by the board that the Munson Steamship Co. will request some relief under their contract. It is true, however, that there is no legal obligation on the part of the board to in any way relieve the Munson Steamship Co.

The irrevocable letter of credit in lieu of cash payment, although proven satisfactory in cases of other sales, is not as satisfactory as the cash payment. The Munson Steamship Co. was compelled to pay cash for the first payment, and as the American Oriental Mail Line has a brighter outlook toward success I believe the cash payment should be insisted upon in this case. Mr. Keene, in his letter of April 9, 1926, indicates that in case the line is awarded to him the first payment will be made in cash.

The American Oriental Mail Line is now operating on a schedule with a sailing every 12 days, or 30 round voyages per year. I believe the business in the Northwest is sufficient to maintain the present schedule, and there are possibilities with the line efficiently operated to further increase the trade to a point where additional ships would be justified. The present form of contract provides a minimum of 17 round voyages per year with a proviso that the purchaser may, upon application to and with the approval of the Shipping Board, divert one or more of the vessels to another service operated under the American flag. Mr. Dollar requested a change in the original form of contract so as to permit him, in case the line was sold to his company, to divert one or more of the vessels, and I believe it was his intention in making this request to place the vessels so diverted from the Seattle service in either the California service or round-the-world service.

This provision should not be allowed, as I feel it may work to the disadvantage of the Pacific Northwest and particularly to the detriment of the port of Seattle. The service was established for the benefit of the Pacific Northwest, and I believe it should remain so.

There is no good reason why the liquidated damage clause should be waived in this sale. It was applied in the Munson contract, and it affords the protection I think the Government should have in the maintenance of service.

The bond, as provided in the original form of contract, should also apply in the sale of this service. It was required in the sale of the California Orient Line and the Pan American Line, and it will give the protection I think the Government should have in the American Oriental Mail Line. Surely, were the liquidated damages and bond requirements waived in this case, it would be reasonable to assume that the Dollar Steamship Co., who purchased the Pacific Mail and the Munson Steamship Co., would request some relief under their sale contracts.

Briefly, I do not believe that the Government is properly protected in the form of contract on which bids are now being considered. The ships to be sold are substantially the same as those sold to the Dollar Steamship Co., namely the California Orient Line, and to the Munson Steamship Co., and in fairness to these two companies I believe the terms and conditions should be more on the same basis for all.

The original cost of the five ships to be sold is as follows:

President Jefferson	$7,202,170.91
President Grant	5,616,420.09
President Madison	5,848,863.59
President Jackson	6,365,118.88
President McKinley	6,906,426.59

Average cost..... 6,387,806.01

In addition to the original cost there has been spent on each vessel many thousand dollars for improvements. The service has been built up at a large expense to the Government to a point where the line is now on practically a paying basis. The financial statement for the calendar year 1925, which shows a loss of $1,165,716.69, is not a true reflection as to the result of the operation of this service. There is to be taken into consideration the extraordinary reconditioning expense during the calendar year 1925 of approximately $900,000. As a possibility of what the line should do throughout the year, I would call the board's attention to the results of the following terminations of ships in this service during recent months:

Vessel	Date of termination ¹	Result
President Jefferson	Mar. 26, 1926	$30,501.95
President McKinley	Mar. 13, 1926	$27,445.05
President Jackson	Mar. 2, 1926	$45,784.45
President Madison	Feb. 18, 1926	$17,992.91
President Grant	Feb. 6, 1926	$1,665.23
President Jefferson	Jan. 26, 1926	$9,948.61
President McKinley	Jan. 12, 1926	$41,672.43
President Jackson	Jan. 2, 1926	$72,528.35
President Madison	Dec. 21, 1925	$29,322.85
President Grant	Dec. 9, 1925	$26,814.39
President Jefferson	Nov. 27, 1925	$2,060.68
President McKinley	Nov. 14, 1925	$11,002.53
President Jackson	Nov. 2, 1925	$3,670.99
President Madison	Oct. 21, 1925	$8,752.79
		$294,494.17

² Profit.

³ Loss.

⁴ Net profit.

In arriving at these results each vessel has been charged with its proportionate share of the administrative expenses of the Fleet Corporation, these charges totaling $66,583.86. This and other facts lead to the conclusion that under private operation these voyages would have returned even greater profits.

The above is a more favorable showing than that of the Pan American Line prior and up to the time of sale. The offer of the high bidder of $900,000 per vessel is $225,000 less per ship than that received for five vessels of the same type sold to the Dollar Steamship Co. with the California Orient service and is $126,000 less per vessel than the price received for four vessels sold to the Munson Steamship Co. with the Pan America service.

In connection with the statement made in Mr. Dollar's letter of April 6, 1926, accompanying his bid, concerning the necessity of remodeling and alterations to passenger accommodations in order to increase the carrying capacity at an estimated expense of $225,000 per vessel, I would call the board's attention to the fact that the accommodations in the five vessels now in this service are practically the same in number and arrangement as those in the five vessels of the California Orient Line, and it is my opinion that this expense is not warranted as evidenced by the fact that the present accommodations are rarely used to capacity and on many voyages less than 30 per cent of the spaces are sold.

In view of the above it is my opinion that the price offered is not adequate for this service.

While I have no criticism to make of the organization of the Admiral Oriental Line as an organization, I believe their interests rest in California, the headquarters of the Dollar Steamship Co., so that for the best interests of the domestic community I think the board would be fulfilling the interest of clause 7 of the merchant marine act of 1920 if it would place this service in the hands of Seattle interests who have their entire interests centered in the Northwest. Therefore, it is my recommendation that the bids received on April 6, 1926, be rejected, and as the negotiation for the sale of this line has been in progress for many months without satisfactory results, to the detriment of the service, I also recommend that further negotiations be suspended.

In my memorandum of November 30, 1925, I recommended that in case satisfactory bids were not received that the line be allocated to another managing operator, this recommendation having been originally made by Mr. Haney at a meeting of the Shipping Board in November. Mr. Haney, representing the Pacific Northwest, perhaps knew the conditions in that section better than anyone else in the Shipping Board or Fleet Corporation. The board, at a meeting on December 3, 1925, approved this recommendation, and if the board approves my recommendation contained in this memorandum to reject the offers for purchase and it is of the same opinion that a new operator should be selected and will so advise, I will be glad to submit immediately the name of a managing operator which will be satisfactory to the Fleet Corporation.

For the board's information in considering this matter, there are attached the original of the following telegrams received by the Fleet Corporation. I might say that Captain Bookwalter has just returned from the Orient from reviewing the conditions:

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Did I understand the gentleman to say that they are not required to sail under the American flag?

Mr. WOOD. Oh, no. These vessels are sailed under the American flag, but I say they did not sail under the American flag before the war, and that they can transfer one or more of these vessels, and the contract lasts for only a period of five years. I wish everyone would read this record. It is so startling that it is astounding. The Munsons bought some of these lines. They had to put up a bond of a million or more dollars to guarantee performance of the contract. The Dollars under this contract did not put up any bond at all, and they paid 2½ per cent down on a $4,500,000 contract, and pay 22½ per cent, making 25 per cent in a period of five years, for which they proposed to give a letter of credit. That letter of credit may be good or bad, depending upon the bank when that time expires. They do not give a bond for one single dollar or anything else for performance, except the guaranty that they have written in this contract that these vessels may be taken away from them, a thing that was never done before and should not be done now.

The Dollars have a line from British Columbia. They are under contract and in cooperation with the Japanese. They have a line where they own both the freight and the passenger rights from Seattle, and they are now operating this oriental line under a contract with the Shipping Board. They are diverting the traffic. They are telling the people in Seattle that instead of going to the Orient over this line, sailing out of Seattle, they will pay their way down to San Francisco and take them over their line from that point, because they can then enjoy the beauties of the Shasta route. No one, and no combination of persons, should have a monopoly of traffic across the sea from this country to the Orient. You gentlemen from the West who have been telling us of the fears that you entertain about what may occur from the yellow race on the other side of the sea, are to-day being submitted to a combination and organization of capital that is hand-in-hand with this very yellow people that you so dread.

We are spending now, and we have been spending, all the way from $40,000,000 to $50,000,000 a year in paying for losses upon the American merchant marine. It is one of the best investments that we have ever made. We have been reducing it until now the question between us is as to whether it shall be $13,900,000 or $18,000,000. We are spending $250,000,000 a year for the maintenance of the Navy, and without this merchant marine the Navy would not amount to anything, absolutely nothing. Yet if we are to dispose of these lines as they have been disposed of—and I expect that we are powerless because of the action of this arrogant board—we will have surrendered the greatest arm the Navy has on the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. Is not that exactly what the gentleman and I voted for? Did we not vote to have the Shipping Board get out of the shipping business and sell these lines to private interest? It seems to me that the gentleman's remarks, if anyone has made a mistake, ought to be directed toward the Shipping Board and not to the purchasers. The purchaser complied with the law as I understand it, and was $500 the highest bidder. I do not see where any criticism can lie against him.

Mr. WOOD. I am devoting it to the Shipping Board, and I say now that there can not be too much said in accusation against the Shipping Board.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman discuss his part of the matter, viz, whether he has changed his views as to whether we ought to dispose of the ships and turn them over to private interests or operate them as a government?

Mr. WOOD. No; I have not. They ought to be disposed of to private interests. Let me tell you what happened. There were 15 men who came here from Seattle. They told me their combined wealth is twice or three times over that of the Dollars—gentlemen here know, Members of the House, as to the truth of this—trying to act within the provision of section 7 of the merchant marine act for the disposition of these vessels, trying to buy the freighters outright, as there was more loss than on passenger vessels, and asked the privilege of a few months until they could organize to take over these other vessels—

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has consumed 15 minutes.

Mr. WOOD. I shall take 10 additional minutes. Now, I want to say in all honor to Captain Crowley, who is the responsible head of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, that in his opinion the opportunity ought to be given to these men in order that we would carry out the law as this Congress dictated in that section 7 of the merchant marine act. There is just one man on that Shipping Board in my opinion who is entitled to more respect than anybody else there, not only because of his honesty of purpose but his patriotism as shown through years of service, and that is Admiral Benson. [Applause.] He believes this thing should not be consummated. I am told that Mr. Plummer, who is sick and away, would have voted against it had he been here, but the other four gentlemen like adamant stood up for this Dollar Line. One of these men, Mr. Teller, I will say, when he was trying to get his confirmation, admitted to Senator Jones that he was opposed to putting a monopoly of the seas in the hands of the Dollars and would vote against it. Yet he was one of the most partisan in favor of the Dollars, and this man, Hill, from Dakota, who knows perhaps the difference between a schooner and a ship, I do not know whether he does or not, his objection was that some of these gentlemen who were proposing to take over this line themselves were shippers, and shippers ought not to have anything to do with the purchase of the vessels, has no fitness for a place on this board.

Mr. BEGG. Is it not a fact that Admiral Benson has been open and aboveboard against the United States selling any ships at all—

Mr. WOOD. No—

Mr. BEGG. In other words, he is in favor of Government operation and opposed to the sale of all of them?

Mr. WOOD. No; the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. BEGG. That is the understanding I have regarding his position.

Mr. WOOD. Yesterday morning I went down and had a conference before this board, and I tried to show them what the objection was against this proposition, and my objection has come through years of investigation we have had before this Appropriations Committee, of investigation that has come unbiased, if you please, and the facts we have gathered in reference to the maintenance of the United States merchant marine. This transaction has occurred not only against the recommendation of Mr. Crowley, whose report I am going to put in the RECORD, and which I hope every Member will read, but against the recommendation of a man by the name of Bookwalter, who they themselves sent across on the other side of the sea to investigate this thing, and he sent telegrams back here—two, I think—advising against the sale of these ships to the Dollars. The telegrams are as follows:

PORTLAND, OREG., April 10, 1926.

G. K. NICHOLS,

Emergency Fleet, Washington, D. C.:

Your wire to San Francisco telephoned me to Portland. The American Oriental Mail Line is a member of the Shipping Board conference and represents American Pioneer Line and American Oriental Mail Lines cargo boats. As a member of other conferences, they vote the Dollar Lines, American Oriental Mail Line, American Pioneer Line. This gives them dominance in various conferences at Hongkong, Shanghai, Manila, and Kobe. By the use of these votes they have been able to control the rates so that the freight ships have been compelled to quote rates similar to passenger ships, while competitors with other freight lines have been outside the conference and have quoted 10 per cent less, thereby securing the cargo. The Dollar interests take advantage of this further by sending their own privately owned freight line, operated partly under American, partly under foreign flags, to pick up this freight. As long as American Oriental Mail Line is under control of Shipping Board we can in a measure control this vote; but if this line goes under private operation, our other lines must either get out of conference or submit to control by Dollar interests. At the same time the Dollar freight boats can be used as desired. Dollar freight boats now have contract for all sugar from Philippines to San Francisco. They are also calling at north China ports in competition with Shipping Board boats operated by Oregon Oriental Line. Our bad showing in the past in my opinion is largely due to domination of Dollar interests, and believe this can be shown. A great many shippers in the Orient have expressed to me in strong terms their fear of a monopoly should Dollar interests secure the American Oriental Mail Line passenger ships, and do not hesitate to state that they will immediately use other means of transportation in order to avoid this monopoly. You know they have recently taken over the oil contract from San Francisco formerly in hands of Struthers & Barry. Further, I do not believe that the American Oriental Mail Line passenger ships have had a fair chance to show what their earnings would be under management who had no other interests than the success of this individual line, and the figures upon which they are now basing value of service and ships is not a proper basis for the sale of these ships to anybody. I strongly recommend against this sale to the Dollar interests, as it will create a monopoly inimical to our own lines and to the American merchant marine in general. No. 88.

BOOKWALTER.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., April 8, 1926.

NICHOLS,

Fleet Corporation, Washington, D. C.:

Re tel. sixth American Oriental Mail Line. Recommend sale not be made for reason that due to fact that in the various conferences in the Far East the interests represented by the Dollar Co.—namely, the Dollar Steamship Co., American Oriental Mail Line, American Pioneer Line, are dominant, as they now have three votes. As long as American Oriental Mail Line is controlled by Shipping Board the Shipping Board conference can control this vote. If, however, this line passes to private control, Shipping Board loses control of conference votes. This places Oregon Oriental Line and American Far East Line, American Oriental Mail Line cargo ships through conference votes directly under control and at mercy of Dollar interests. Even now these lines are seriously handicapped. I now have complete report of this condition written out and ready to present to you, which will explain this very complicated condition in detail. By surrendering control of American Oriental Mail Line we also surrender control of all Shipping Board services operating to and from the Orient four sixty-six.

BOOKWALTER, Seattle.

It was against the protest of the chamber of commerce of the city of Seattle, which has a most vital interest in this thing. It was against the protest of the chamber of commerce of the city of Portland, Oreg.

PORTLAND, OREG., April 11, 1926.

President CROWLEY,

Emergency Fleet Corporation, Washington, D. C.

We have steadfastly opposed every monopoly move for control of Shipping Board fleet. We still believe competitive control and operation of units having sufficient strength for individual effort should be the policy of the Shipping Board and the Government. Delivering the only two cargo-passenger lines owned by the Shipping Board on the Pacific and operating to the Orient to one company would be a violation of the antimonopoly policy. We believe this should not be permitted. For these reasons we ask the Emergency Fleet Corporation not to make the sale of the Admiral Oriental steamers to the Dollar interests, which already own and operate the Pacific Mail and a round-the-world service between San Francisco and the Orient.

PORTLAND CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

They did it against the advice and protest of Senator Jones from the State of Washington, who has given this matter very great thought and consideration. They did it against the suggestion and advice of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of this House. They did it against my suggestion. They did it against the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I am not familiar with the transaction with the Dollar Line; but what is the position of the board? What do they say about this sale that the gentleman thinks was wrong? If it was wrong, do they offer any reasons or excuse?

Mr. WOOD. I will tell you how they excuse themselves, and the only excuse they offered yesterday morning was that they were trying to get themselves to a point where they could operate within the appropriation.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I will say to the gentleman that is one of the things I told the gentleman and the House a week or 10 days ago would result from cutting down the necessary funds. Of course, it does not excuse the board for any wrongful act, if they have done wrong. I know Captain Dollar is one of the greatest and best ship operators of this or any other age. But when you fail to appropriate money, and tell this organization that it must operate within certain very small figures, the gentleman and his party are on dangerous ground in reference to the merchant marine—indeed, you destroy it.

Mr. WOOD. The very gentlemen making that excuse had the promise of gentlemen in the Senate; they had the promise of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of this side; they had the assurance of the Budget and of the President of the United States—that they never would want a dollar.

It is a mere excuse, a subterfuge. And I want to say that it has just simply demonstrated the weakness of this law under which this board operates when these men, selected as they must be from different sections of the country, are selected without regard to their fitness, when they are utterly and completely unfit. Take this man O'Connor. He was a stevedore at Buffalo, and he is a stevedore now. [Laughter.] Take this man Hill. He comes from South Dakota. I have nothing to say with reference to his character, but I do not think he has any qualification for the position he now holds. You take this man Teller. He simply got his position and was confirmed under false pretenses. Now tell me, with these millions and millions of dollars in the biggest business concern in the world in the hands of these men, when there is constant contradiction and conflict between them, that the best interests of the country are going to be conserved.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Who appointed these three men?

Mr. WOOD. Well, here is the trouble about that business. I expect the President of the United States is more abused than anybody. I do not know what is in his mind about this, but I expect that if he had looked into this thing with the interest that some of these gentlemen have manifested the same thing would have happened to him that did happen to him when he tried to take action and make an investigation of the Tariff Board, that they would come up here with a resolution to investigate him. It is a deplorable thing. It is something that you and I are responsible for, in a measure, ourselves.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. The gentleman does not contend that we are responsible for the appointment of these men?

Mr. WOOD. No; you are not responsible for some of these appointments, except we voted for a law that provides this shall be selected from different sections of the country. Some of them we inherited, but some of them are our own. It is of little consequence whether they are Democrats or Republicans. It is of much importance whether they are efficient for their jobs.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I was not inquiring as to their politics. I wanted to know who appointed them.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Regardless of politics, does not the gentleman agree with me that such acts of the board, right or wrong, are due to the policy on the part of this Congress and the administration in dealing with this activity of the Government? Is not this action of Congress in furnishing insufficient funds practically a suggestion or invitation to these gentlemen of the board to disregard the original purposes of the shipping act, or to get rid of ships in order to meet this insufficient appropriation?

Mr. WOOD. No. It simply affords them an excuse to carry out their designs. There is no trouble about Congress appropriating money enough to carry on this business. It may be that they can get along within the $13,900,000. But I would not let this opportunity pass without registering my protest against what I think has been the greatest blow that has been administered to the establishment of an American merchant marine.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to state that I agree with the gentleman from Indiana, that the Shipping Board made a very grave mistake in this matter of the Dollar Line. I think they sold the ships for less than they ought to have been sold for, and I think they ought not to have been sold to the same companies that are operating ships out of San Francisco. And then, for the further reason, and in response to the question of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Bege] on the subject of bids, while it is true that when the bids were first submitted the Dollar Line bid the most, yet they were opened up, as the gentleman from Indiana suggested, and by a later bid a local interest bid more than had been bid by the Dollar Line, and for that reason and for the further reason that they were local interests, they were entitled to the first chance for the purchase of the ships under the law, as the gentleman from Indiana suggests.

But I think it is nothing but fair to say that there has been a tremendous pressure brought to bear upon the Shipping Board from various sources to get rid of these ships, to get them into the hands of private interests, no matter what the sacrifice was, and perhaps they were influenced to a large degree by that pressure, and I think they were influenced and affected by a prospect of a reduced appropriation. I am advised they are proceeding to make further curtailments because of that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has 20 minutes.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not think this mistake, as I view it, was due to any fault of the law, but it was due to a disregard of the law, the Jones Act of 1920. And I think it is fair to say that not only Admiral Benson and Mr. Plummer were opposed to that sale, which had been pending for months, but also Mr. Haney, who was a representative of the Shipping Board, was opposed to it, and this action was not taken until after he got off the board. And that very fact shows the importance of maintaining regional representation. If the Northwest had still been represented on the board, the chances are very likely that this sale could have been prevented, as it was prevented when the Northwest section had a representative on the Shipping Board. In other words, three of the old members stood steadfastly against this sale, and the sale was put over by the chairman of the Shipping Board and the three most recent appointees thereon.

But in this connection and in respect to the appropriation, I want to ask the gentleman from Indiana this, and in doing so I want to say that I believe the gentleman from Indiana is sincerely in favor of maintaining an American merchant marine. His expressions and his conduct heretofore have convinced me of that fact. But now you are proposing to appropriate $13,900,000 for the operation of 276 ships that are now in operation by the Emergency Fleet Corporation, and that $13,900,000 also must cover all administrative expenses, salaries, and all other expenses. Now, you are providing a $10,000,000 defense fund to take care of the ships that may come back from the purchasers. Only 43 of those ships that have been sold are in operation in the foreign trade and 22 of those are in the hands of absolutely solvent companies and are already succeeding, so there is no chance of more than 21 coming back, and there is no present prospect of that. Does not the gentleman think that $13,900,000 for paying all of the expenses and keeping 276 ships in operation is out of all proportion to $10,000,000 to operate 21 ships that may come back?

Mr. WOOD. I will say in answer to the gentleman that his conjecture might be correct if we were proceeding upon the old line of procedure, but they have been reducing the amount of their overhead and they have made a most commendable reduction in that respect within the last year.

Here was the great trouble about this thing: They had offices all around the world; those offices were filled with people, many of whom were just simply there for the purpose of drawing their salaries, and it was a hard job and took a long time to eliminate them. They are not all out yet, but they are still getting them out.

It may be possible to get along within the $13,900,000. Some of these gentlemen think they can do it, but if they can not this Congress is going to be back here and we will give them all the money they need.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has again expired.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman have one additional minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I notice that Senate amendment No. 12, which struck out the limitation that the House Committee on Appropriations inserted in the bill with reference to the Federal Trade Commission's investigations—

Mr. WOOD. That comes up in connection with the vote on these amendments.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. No; that is in the conference report and was agreed to. The gentleman represented the views of the House so efficiently that the Senate was forced to yield. I was wondering whether the gentleman had much trouble in getting the Senate to yield.

Mr. WOOD. What is that amendment?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. That was the amendment which hamstrung the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. WOOD. No; we did not have much trouble in getting the Senate to yield, because they sometimes exercise some good sense over there.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The House conferees stood up valiantly for the position of the House?

Mr. WOOD. Yes; we did; we did fine and we won.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. And the Senate was vanquished?

Mr. WOOD. Yes. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG].

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I want to call the attention of the House to what I think is a fair observation about this controversy. I do not believe there can be any gainsaying the fact that the House went on record specifically in favor of the Government getting out of the shipping business just as speedily as possible, and even went so far as to lay down certain requirements that the purchasers should meet. I know I voted for that and I am still in that same position. So far as I am concerned, if we could sell the remainder of the ships as advantageously as we have made this sale, and to as responsible a seaman as Captain Dollar, I would sell them all and vote for it this afternoon.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. BEGG. Yes.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Is it not a fact that this sale, which the gentleman commends, was made at about one-fourth the price of ships sold to the Munson Line on the Atlantic coast?

Mr. BEGG. I do not care and that does not enter into it. The only thing that is to be considered by this House is this: We created machinery to dispose of our merchant marine, and the only way that Congress can have in selecting the personnel is through the executive branch of the Government. I am one Congressman who is perfectly willing to abide by the actions of the men selected by President Coolidge in 99 cases out of 100, and if there is any evidence of any crooked work or any graft or anything of that kind then there is a method of procedure. But I hesitate to question the reputation of any man or corporation simply because some men feel we have not received as much money as we ought to have received. We have received an enormous price. If we could dispose of the whole merchant marine on the same favorable basis—if you will figure it over a period of 10 or 15 years—we would be doing very well, because every year we are dumping millions into the sinkhole of the merchant marine.

There is nobody in Congress or out who questions the reputation of the Dollar Steamship Company; there is nobody in Congress or out who questions their ability to operate a steamship company, and if there is anybody who questions their loyalty to American interests, I have yet to hear the question raised. I firmly believe that Captain Dollar is doing more to promote peace in the Orient than all other Government agencies combined. If there is any criticism to be made of this transaction that criticism ought to be leveled directly at the men responsible, namely, the Shipping Board. As for Admiral Benson being opposed to it and being the only man on the Shipping Board who voted against it, to me it means nothing. I do not believe Admiral Benson would deny he was open and above board in favoring Government operation of the merchant marine. That is not to his discredit; that is to his credit, that he has the courage to come out and be honest and say that if he had his way about it he would not sell a single merchant ship. But Congress has decreed that the United States is to go out of the shipping business.

It does not require a long memory to recall when the gentleman from Indiana—and this statement is not made in any critical way, because I followed him—advocated on the floor of this House a cutting of salaries in the Shipping Board because the members of that board, I believe, were paid $35,000 at the time. Now, $35,000 for a certain man might be too much; it might be too much for the individual who was drawing the salary, but a man big enough to operate five of those vessels on one line is worth twice $35,000 and can command that salary in any private corporation in America.

So I think, Mr. Speaker, we ought to direct our criticism in some other direction.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

The conference report was adopted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the first amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 1: On page 4 of the bill, after line 10, insert: "That the salary of the Allen Property Custodian be, and the same is hereby, fixed at the sum of $10,000 per annum from and after July 1, 1926."

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield me a couple of minutes?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I think the Allen Property Custodian under existing law will be getting $7,500 on the 1st of July. He will be getting as much for the work performed as anybody doing like work in the Government. I do not think the fact he was a Senator at one time should have anything to do with fixing his rate of pay. I am very sorry to see the question raised here, but I realize that conferees frequently have to come back with things that are inserted by the Senate, and these conferees were in no different attitude from many others. I am opposed to the motion of my colleague on the committee to recede and concur, and I hope the House will not agree to the Senate amendment.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Indiana yield me three minutes?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I simply want to concur in what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has said. I have often wondered just when Congress is going to cease raising the salaries of the higher-paid employees of the Government. I do not think I ever knew of a proposition to raise the salary of one of these higher-paid employees that is as indefensible as this proposition, and in saying that I am casting no reflection whatsoever upon the House conferees, because, as the gentleman from Illinois has said, they, of course, in conference with the Senate, must many times yield on matters which their own judgment opposes.

When the Allen Property Custodian office was first created, and at a time when gentlemen will all agree that the Allen Property Custodian had more responsibility and more duties to perform than at any time since, because at that time he had to pass upon all kinds of questions as to what property should be taken over, as to what disposition should be made of various kinds of business which was taken over throughout the country as well as its control and management of the property and business which was taken over, the salary was $7,500. Later on that Allen Property Custodian became Attorney General and another one was appointed. Then later on at different times two former Members of this House were appointed. It was last held by the gentleman from New York, Mr. Hicks, an honored and respected and highly esteemed former Member of this House who unfortunately died in office. No one suggested that his salary should be increased from $7,500 to $10,000; but, he died, and then an ex-United States Senator was appointed, and at the very first opportunity the Senate proposes to increase his salary in the face of the fact that a committee is now considering an administration measure which will doubtless pass at this session, which proposes to turn back more than 90 per cent of the property now held by the Allen Property Custodian. I say it is wholly and utterly indefensible to raise this salary at this time when his responsibilities will be so greatly reduced and his duties so much less after this administration measure passes.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Before the classification act was passed, Mr. Speaker, if I may inject this into the speech of the gentleman from Tennessee, the Allen Property Custodian got $5,000 a year. Then later on he got $6,000, and the salary went up to $6,500 under the average, and by reason of language placed in all the appropriation bills the average would go to $7,500 after the first of July, and surely that is all he ought to get, because that is all anybody doing like work in the Government service is now getting.

Mr. BYRNS. I thank the gentleman from Illinois for the correction so far as the amount of salary is concerned. I was entirely in error as to the amount of the salaries of former custodians. Up until possibly two years ago it was $6,000. Now it is $6,500, and this proposed increase amounts to 33 1/4 per cent. The present custodian accepted it at $6,500. He will get $7,500 July 1. Why increase it?

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Has anybody ever refused this job at the present salary provided?

Mr. BYRNS. No; not that I have ever heard of, and none will refuse, and I do not think we ought to increase the salary merely because the present occupant is a former Senator.

Mr. SNELL. I entirely agree with the gentleman. I do not think the salary ought to be increased at this time.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes; if I have any time remaining.

Mr. SCHAFER. Did not some of the former Allen Property Custodians get considerable more money than $5,000 or $6,000 of salary, according to the indictments recently returned?

Mr. BYRNS. I understand this is the charge against one of the former custodians.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word in reference to this item. I appreciate there is some substance in what the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Tennessee have said, but I want to say something in defense of the action of your committee. We yielded to this upon the insistence of the Senate conferees. You know this matter of being on a conference committee is a matter of give and take. I think we got more than we lost in yielding to this proposition; but that is neither here nor there.

Some of the gentlemen who occupy these places occupy them by reason of their social position. There are men who would give $100,000 to have a chance to occupy some unimportant position here in order to be connected with the official and social set. The one who is occupying this position, unfortunately, is a poor man. I believe you will all agree he is an honorable and a conscientious man. He has a responsibility that is far beyond the responsibility of any Cabinet officer, so far as responsibility in finance is concerned. He has $240,000,000 or $250,000,000 worth of property in his hands. He is devoting all his time and attention to it.

This gentleman has been an adherent of the policy advocated by Theodore Roosevelt, that we should multiply and increase our representatives on the face of the earth, and that is a pretty expensive proposition in Washington.

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman referred to the amount of money under his jurisdiction. Is there not a bill now pending, which has the support of the administration and for which, I presume, the gentleman will vote, which proposes to return to the owners of this property more than 90 per cent of it?

Mr. WOOD. Absolutely.

Mr. BYRNS. Then why increase his salary?

Mr. WOOD. For this reason: That very operation in itself is freighted with more responsibility than has been charged on the gentlemen who occupied the position during the passing years that we have had an Allen Property Custodian.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think that the distribution of this property, the method of which will be defined in the act, carries more responsibility than the taking it over?

Mr. WOOD. Taking it over was a matter of police force.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. In paying it out all he has to do is to draw a check.

Mr. WOOD. It is not simply drawing a check; he will be responsible in many particulars.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. I will.

Mr. HOWARD. The gentleman from Indiana has stated that socially a great many gentlemen would pay as high as $100,000 for this position, and immediately after his statement another distinguished gentleman on the floor said, sotto voce, that perhaps we ought to put these places up for the highest bidder and give the Treasury the advantage of it. [Laughter.] I do not approve of anything of that kind, but I do not know; if we are to raise these salaries as proposed, I do not know but what the proposition of my friend who sits not far from me might be well worthy of consideration. [Laughter.] Nothing of the kind has ever been tried, and it might be well to adopt it.

Mr. WOOD. When is the gentleman from Nebraska going to ask his question? [Laughter.]

Mr. HOWARD. Pretty soon. [Laughter.] The question that the gentleman from Nebraska desires to ask is, Does the gentleman from Indiana know the names of some of these fellows that would care to pay $100,000 for the position? If he does, he might get into negotiation with the gentleman from Nebraska. [Laughter.]

Mr. WOOD. If I did, it might be embarrassing to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. HOWARD. I thank the gentleman for his consideration of my feelings.

Mr. WOOD. I say to you, gentlemen, that a position of this character is freighted with responsibility in comparison with other positions. They are paying us $10,000 a year, and we are not charged with any $200,000,000 responsibility. I say it would be consistent to pay this gentleman the same amount of money that we are being paid.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. I will.

Mr. SCHAFER. I am in favor of increasing the salary of this custodian. I think the custodian has had an additional responsibility placed on him in view of the fact that we are contemplating returning the property. I think the present custodian has to carefully review the activities of the administration of all the prior custodians to see that justice has been done some of the aliens whose property we have had in our custody.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana to recede and concur in the amendment of the Senate.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SCHAFER) there were 12 ayes and 85 noes.

So the motion was lost.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 9, after the word "expended," insert the following: "Provided, That the act approved February 24, 1925, shall be construed as authorizing the expenditure, by authority of the Arlington Memorial Bridge Commission, of such portion as said commission shall determine, of this or any other appropriation heretofore or hereafter made to carry out said project, for the employment, at such compensation and allowances and on such terms as said commission shall decide, of expert consultants, engineers, architects, sculptors, or artists, or firms, partnerships, or associations thereof, including the facilities, service, travel, and other expenses of their respective organizations so far as employed upon this project, in accordance with the usual customs of their several professions, without regard to the restrictions of law governing the employment, salaries, or traveling expenses of regular employees of the United States."

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Does the last vote have the effect of the House insisting on its disagreement to the Senate amendment?

The SPEAKER. The House further disagrees with the Senate amendment.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. WOOD. I yield to the gentleman three minutes.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the House to this particular amendment. I voted against the original authorization for a memorial bridge over the Potomac. Of course, I realize that since Congress made the authorization and decided by a large majority to build a bridge, proper appropriations should be made, but I do not believe that out of the $14,750,000 that was authorized to build the bridge Congress ought to turn over to the Arlington Memorial Bridge Commission a sweeping authority to employ any number of architects, any number of consulting engineers, any number of artists, any number of sculptors, and fix their salaries regardless of all law on the statute books. That is what this amendment does. It not only applies to the appropriations carried in this bill, but to all future appropriations. Let me read the Senate amendment, so that you may see exactly what it provides:

Provided, That the act approved February 24, 1925, shall be construed as authorizing the expenditure, by authority of the Arlington Memorial Bridge Commission, of such portion as said commission shall determine, of this or any other appropriation heretofore or hereafter made to carry out said project, for the employment, at such compensation and allowances, and on such terms as said commission shall decide, of expert consultants, engineers, architects, sculptors, or artists, or firms, partnerships, or associations thereof, including the facilities, service, travel, and other expenses of their respective organizations so far as employed upon this project, in accordance with the usual customs of their several professions, without regard to the restrictions of law governing the employment, salaries, or traveling expenses of regular employees of the United States.

I never read an amendment which was as broad in its scope as this particular amendment. It gives to the Arlington Memorial Bridge Commission the absolute right, not only out of this appropriation but any appropriation that may be made hereafter, to employ any number of consulting engineers, any number of sculptors, any number of artists, any number of architects or firms or associations or partnerships, and fix their salaries, and also make allowances for them, without regard to the present laws governing such employments. This amendment was evidently framed to get around a disagreement that arose between the efficient Comptroller General and this bridge commission, which wanted to go outside of the law and employ certain persons, and to which the Comptroller General properly objected.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. And to concur in this amendment would be wholly inconsistent with the vote just taken by the House in refusing to increase the salary of a very important official to $10,000 a year.

Mr. BYRNS. Absolutely. We are here giving them the right to pay $50 a day or $100 a day, or even $500 a day, and the Congress has no right to interpose an objection. They can do it by a salary, or if they do not want to do it by a salary then they can fix a salary and make allowances. What do "allowances" mean? They may mean hotel bills or traveling expenses or any one of a thousand things. I do not think Congress wants to go that far. I think Congress wants that bridge built down there, as it said in its vote authorizing its construction, but I do not think you want to take out of the Public Treasury the money belonging to the people and pay any great sum of it to these extra artists and sculptors and consulting engineers, who will probably besiege the commission for employment, when we already have plenty of engineers in the Army and a Supervising Architect and other employees of the Government who can perform that work.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. And the adoption of this amendment is almost certain to cost the Government a great deal more money than if we had adopted the one which we just voted down.

Mr. BYRNS. There is no doubt about that. The adoption of this amendment will run into thousands of dollars for the employment of a lot of doubtful and, in many instances, unnecessary employees.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] has gotten started off on the wrong foot. The purpose of this amendment is to save money and not to spend money. The gentleman said he never saw anything like it in his life, yet he voted for it in the case of the Soldiers' Battle Monument Commission; the same thing exactly is in that appropriation with reference to that.

Mr. BYRNS. What memorial is that?

Mr. WOOD. The battle monuments that we are putting up in France.

Mr. BYRNS. Where only a few hundred thousand dollars are appropriated, and here we have $14,750,000.

Mr. WOOD. We have $3,000,000 appropriated to commence on in this battle-monument project, and I do not know where that will stop or where this present one will stop, but the gentlemen who appeared before our committee, and the gentlemen who appeared on the other side of the Capitol, told us that this would be the means whereby money could be saved. There is a code of ethics among these architects and engineers where if they enter into a competition they can not render their services except in compliance with a certain schedule of fees. If this amendment is adopted, they say they can save money instead of having to submit to this schedule of prices. I think the intention of the gentlemen is quite honest, and I think this will save money.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman has presented an analogy between this amendment and that with reference to the authorization for the Soldiers' Battle Monument Commission in Europe. I think it will be apparent to the gentleman that an entirely different situation is presented, for the reason that the activities of the first commission relate entirely with reference to foreign affairs, where the whole situation will be different.

Mr. WOOD. Oh, the gentleman is wrong with reference to that. So far as the activities in respect to the Soldiers' Battle Monument Commission are concerned, 99 per cent of them are here. The mere execution is over there. The adoption of plans, the construction, and everything of that character are all here, and the engineers and architects have it all to do on this side. All we have to do over there is to set up the monuments after they are completed.

Mr. BANKHEAD. And the money is appropriated for that purpose.

Mr. WOOD. We have already appropriated $3,000,000.

Mr. BANKHEAD. And this Battle Monuments Commission has jurisdiction over the expenditure of $3,000,000?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I regret that the attention of the House was not called to the authority given under that amendment at the time.

Mr. WOOD. I think it was a wise provision and I think this is a wise provision.

Mr. BYRNS. But does not the gentleman think that there should be some limitation? Here is an amendment to provide for not only unlimited numbers of expensive experts and salaries, but the Senate has actually added to the word "salaries" the word "allowances," and then the amendment provides for traveling expenses, and so forth, showing that something else is contemplated than traveling expenses when they use the word "allowances." Does not the gentleman think that before he moves to recede and concur there ought to be some limitation placed on this amendment which would limit the number that can be employed and also limit the amount of salaries that may be paid, as Congress has always done, unless it be in the exception to which the gentleman refers?

Mr. WOOD. But Congress has not always done it.

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman has referred to only one case, and I know of no other.

Mr. WOOD. For instance, they may want some ornamentation. If they have to resort to the law, it might cost them thousands of dollars, where they might offer an incentive to architects and engineers in an opportunity to submit plans and bids and it would not cost them anything.

Mr. BYRNS. But I submit that could be very easily provided for without opening the doors of the Treasury to this Arlington Bridge Commission to spend all the money if they desired to do so for a big corps of high-priced experts.

Mr. WOOD. We are appropriating millions of dollars every year depending upon the faith of those who have to do with the spending of the appropriation. There has been selected a commission of high-minded gentlemen by the Speaker of this House and by the Vice President of the United States, and if we have faith and believe in them we will not go far amiss.

Mr. BYRNS. I do not mean to reflect on any members of the commission. I do not know who they are, but I do think that Congress, which is supposed to guard the Treasury of the people, should put a certain limitation and restriction on this amendment, so that the commission, whether the present or one to succeed it in the future, will not use the appropriation in the employment of unnecessary high-priced sculptors, artists, and so forth. This money will be spent and supervision will be had not by the commission but by some representative chosen for that purpose.

Mr. WOOD. I want to call the attention of the gentleman as to the personnel of this commission, and if we can not have faith in them we had better quit. The members of the commission are the President of the United States, the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the chairmen of the Committees on Public Grounds of the Senate and House of Representatives. This is not an ordinary transaction. It is different from any appropriation we have ever made. It can only be comparable with the appropriations that we made, in my opinion, for the construction of the memorial monument, and to my mind we are going to save money under the ruling of the Comptroller General if we adopt this amendment rather than enlarge the spending of it.

It was the proposal, I know, of those who feel that they were in the right about the thing, and it would be a money saver rather than a money spender; so this House can decide for itself.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. If the gentleman will permit, does the gentleman understand the authority which this amendment would confer would be alone on the condition that the authority would be exercised by that commission—

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. And that it would not authorize them to delegate that authority to others?

Mr. WOOD. No, sir; not in the least.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana to recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the yeas seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. Wood) there were—ayes 34, yeas 44.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I dispute the vote and make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana that the House recede and concur in the amendment. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 128, nays 160, not voting 143, as follows:

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14, line 21, after the word "periodicals" insert: "Payment in advance for subscriptions to newspapers not to exceed $50 per annum."

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will not have any objection to this.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, after line 3 insert:

"FEDERAL OIL CONSERVATION BOARD

"The appropriation of $50,000 made in the first deficiency act, approved January 20, 1925, for the 'Federal Oil Conservation Board, 1925 and 1926,' shall remain available until June 30, 1927."

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in this amendment.

The question was taken and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 25, after line 15 insert: "For all necessary expenses incident to moving various Government departments, bureaus, divisions, and independent establishments and parts thereof from one building to another or moved within a building in the District of Columbia in connection with the assignment, allocation, transfer, and survey of space, including the removal and erection of building partitions, including personal services, without reference to civil-service rules, at rates of pay fixed and determined by the commission and without reference to the classification act of 1923: Provided, That the money herein appropriated may be used for reimbursing the Government departments, bureaus, divisions, independent establishments, and offices for actual expenses incurred by them in complying with the orders of the commission; to be expended on vouchers signed by the chairman of the commission, to be available immediately, and to remain available until expended, $250,000."

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in Senate amendment No. 14.

Mr. BYRNS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana just what changes do they contemplate making in the way of bureau and establishments? I think the House would like to have a little information on that subject.

Mr. WOOD. I will state to the gentleman that this amendment was put on the bill as a Senate amendment at the suggestion of Senator Smoot, who is at the head of the committee on official designations. His committee has had a survey made, and that committee is of opinion that by a readjustment of space they can save the United States Government more than the amount of money covered by this appropriation every year. Upon that representation made and upon the insistence of Senator Smoot—

My BYRNS. I noticed from the newspapers the other day that it was proposed to move the Pension Bureau from its present quarters up to the Interior Department Building.

Mr. WOOD. That is one of the recommendations.

Mr. BYRNS. Does the gentleman know of any other establishment to be moved?

Mr. WOOD. The Compensation Board is to be moved. Here is the trouble with these various administrative bureaus and departments: They are scattered all over the city of Washington. They are not related, and in consequence of their division it costs a great deal of money. The Pension Bureau is now under the Secretary of the Interior, as the gentleman knows. That is one of the largest items of saving in this calculation.

Mr. BYRNS. I am not questioning the advisability of making these changes, because I am satisfied they will not be made unless money is saved. What occurred to me was that a quarter of a million dollars is a whole lot of money to be spent in moving bureaus from one building to another. That is a whole lot of money to be used for such a purpose.

Mr. WOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that it also struck me that $250,000 was a lot of money to be spent in moving, but when I took into consideration the number of these activities that we have here and the trouble involved in effecting their removal, I was satisfied that it was necessary.

Mr. BYRNS. If the gentleman feels that that is not too much, I shall not object.

Mr. WOOD. I believe the gentleman from Tennessee realizes that Senator Smoot has given this question perhaps more attention and study than anybody else. He thinks this ought to be done, and I am relying largely on his judgment.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. AYRES. Were there any hearings on this proposition as to whether there would be any particular saving in moving the Pension Bureau to the old Interior Department Building? And for what purposes is the Pension Building to be used hereafter?

Mr. WOOD. There were no hearings before the House committee, but there were hearings before the Senate committee. They were very brief, but very pointed.

Mr. AYRES. Is there anything to show for just what purpose the old Pension Building is to be used?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes. Those things are all pointed out in the hearings. The very purpose of this consolidation is to get these activities together as near as possible. Take, for example, the General Accounting Office. It is lodged in some 40 different buildings in the city of Washington.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, perhaps the information that is now being imparted is valuable to these two gentlemen, but I submit that the rest of the House would like to have some information.

Mr. AYRES. I am perfectly willing for the rest of the House to hear it. They ought to hear. I am still not satisfied that it is necessary. Or, in other words, I am not satisfied that it is a saving to move the old Pension Bureau at this time down to the Interior Building. That is what this vote will do. It will do it. At the present time they have not any too much room for taking care of the pension business of this country. As I understand it, there will be less room given them if they move into the Interior Department Building than they have in the present Pension Bureau Building. I do not think it is a saving to spend $250,000 to move the Pension Bureau into the Interior Department building.

Mr. ARENTZ. What are we going to use the Pension Building for when they have moved?

Mr. AYRES. That is what I was asking of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. WOOD. We have what is known as the Public Buildings Committee. The function of that committee is to try to conserve space for the public activities. This committee has made a survey of the public buildings and the possibilities of the conservation of space. This proposal is the result of that survey. One of the main items is to remove the Pension Office into the Department of the Interior Building, one of the biggest buildings that we have; to take a lot of these rag-tag and bob-tailed activities that they have in the Department of the Interior and consolidate them down in the Pension Office Building. The gentlemen who are charged with this responsibility have told us that it would result in a saving in one year of practically as much as the amount of this appropriation.

I want to call the attention of gentlemen now to this fact, that one of the most important offices that we have is the General Comptroller's office. That has lodgement in 40 different houses in the city of Washington, with a constant mix up. One of the purposes is sometime to take and get these different activities somewhere near the center of their seat of action. This is the beginning of that proposition. We have passed here a public buildings bill, the purpose of which is to build some additional public buildings in the city of Washington.

Senator Smoot has been at the head of this commission for a long time, and has been conscientiously trying to concentrate these things so that when a man wants to find some place he will know where to go. If you were to start out to find something with reference to a particular matter concerning the Internal Revenue Bureau you would probably have to go to 15 different places.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. We all realize that, and we are all in sympathy with the gentleman; at least I am. I always want to support the gentleman, because he does some very splendid work on the Appropriations Committee. But does it not occur to the gentleman that $250,000 for moving bureaus is an absolutely ridiculous proposition?

Mr. WOOD. I will say to the gentleman, as I said to the gentleman from Tennessee a while ago, that at first blush it seemed to me as though $250,000 was a very great amount of money to move these bureaus. It would not cost the gentleman from Oklahoma or myself anything like that to move our effects.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I will move away from everything I have for 1 per cent of that.

Mr. WOOD. But the gentleman from Oklahoma should realize that there are more than 100 different places involved in this proposed reorganization and which will have to be moved. If it does not cost $250,000, it will not be spent, but it may, and in all probability will, cost more.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Can the gentleman give specific information as to what bureaus will be moved under this $250,000, so that the House may form some idea as to whether it is an extravagant or economical proposition?

Mr. WOOD. I will say the information we have is that it will save us more money in one year than the entire cost of this removal, and we get that information from gentlemen upon whom we must rely.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Of course, that is a conclusion and not any information about the subject upon which we can form an opinion. I repeat that it appears to me $250,000 for moving a few bureaus is absolutely ridiculous.

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. LOZIER. I understand that the Pension Bureau is opposed to this removal on this ground: The personnel of the Pension Bureau amounts to about 820; the Pension Building is made up of large rooms, and in those rooms a unit or a particular branch of the bureau can be lodged. The head of the largest unit in the Pension Bureau told me this morning that he has 120 employees in his unit. He said:

Every one of them is in my sight, and I can oversee them every minute. If they put us down in the Interior Department Building, with a lot of small rooms, all separated, we never would be able to know what is going on, and it would increase the expense and reduce the efficiency.

I am wondering whether or not this matter has been definitely determined upon.

Mr. WOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri that I think it has been. Of course, I realize this, and the gentleman must know, by reason of his experience, that the various activities in this town do not want to be disturbed. They desire to be let alone. There are two things I have found that every bureau in this Government is prompted by. One is to get as many people as they can under their supervision and the second is to do as little work as possible. Now, this commission has determined that this action is in the interest of economy, and I think it ought to have the respect of this House. It is a joint commission made up of Members of this House and the Senate. We are constantly being urged to find more room and more room. We built a whole lot of temporary buildings during the war, and which we felt were only necessary to supply the emergencies of the war. We built the Army Building in the Mall and made it permanent in character, because we expected it would take about 10 years after the close of the war to close up the odds and ends of the war, yet this thing has resulted: All of those temporary buildings, or most of them, are still being occupied, and we are still being pressed for more room by reason of the expansion of our Government, whether necessary or unnecessary. The two buildings in the Mall which we built of a more permanent character were supposed to have been torn down in 10 years. It will soon be 10 years after the close of the war, and yet those buildings will stand for 100 years, in my opinion, notwithstanding the judgment of the gentlemen who think they are a blot on the artistic effect of the city.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Indiana to recede and concur.

The motion was agreed to.

FEDERAL AID IN ROAD CONSTRUCTION

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 174.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa calls up a privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 174

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9504) entitled "A bill to amend the act entitled 'An act to provide that the United States shall aid the States in the construction of rural post roads, and for other purposes,' approved July 11, 1916, as amended and supplemented, and for other purposes." After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed four hours, to be equally divided and controlled between the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Roads, the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. After such reading has been completed the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I would like to see whether we can agree on time. How much time does the gentleman from Alabama want on his side?

Mr. BANKHEAD. On the rule?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will not ask for more than 20 minutes, and probably will not consume that much time.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to limit debate on the rule to 40 minutes, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and one-half by myself, and at the close of debate that the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that debate on this resolution be limited to 40 minutes, one-half to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], and that at the conclusion of debate the previous question shall be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is the gentleman going to finish this evening? It is now 5 o'clock.

Mr. RAMSEYER. As far as the gentleman from Iowa is concerned, he is ready to go ahead and dispose of the rule. Of course, he is subject to the will of the House.

Mr. BLANTON. The rule is still good in the morning. You are not going to have 40 minutes debate to-night, are you?

Mr. RAMSEYER. We will go along as long as we can. It is not 5 o'clock now.

Mr. BLANTON. We are a month ahead of the Senate right now. What is the use of working so late.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, personally I only desire to take up a few minutes to explain the purpose of the rule. The rule calls up what is commonly called the Dowell road bill and makes that bill in order. It provides for four hours of general debate in the Committee of the Whole House, one-half to be controlled by the chairman of the committee and the other half by the ranking minority member on the committee. After the general debate is concluded it is taken up under the five-minute rule. Then it is reported back to the House and the previous question is considered ordered.

The Dowell road bill is H. R. 9504. It authorizes the continuation of the appropriation for the road-building program for two years, the fiscal year ending June 30, 1928, and the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and authorizes an appropriation for each of those years of $75,000,000.

This is what is being done now and has been done for a number of years. That is, under the law of 1916. That law, as many of you will recall, is known as the Shackleford good roads law, former Representative Shackleford, of Missouri, being the then chairman of the newly created Committee on Roads.

The bill provides for the forest trails $7,500,000 yearly for two years; that is, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1928, and the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929.

This is one of those Federal-aid projects. Since I have been in Congress I have never been very enthusiastic for the extension of Federal aid, but this particular Federal aid, I think, has amply justified itself. It is not new; in fact, Federal aid of this kind has been used ever since the foundation of the Government. The Government has made appropriations for and has encouraged the building of highways for transportation, river improvement, harbor improvement, and the building of canals, and the building of highways. Then during the railroad-building era the Government in many ways appropriated hundreds of millions of dollars, and not only the Federal Government but the State governments and the local governments, to encourage the building of railroads. Local communities taxed themselves and bonded themselves to get railroads.

Governor Larrabee, of Iowa, who was governor of our State from 1886 to 1890, was one of the pioneers in the movement to regulate the railroads and railroad rates. He wrote a book on railroads which I read about 25 years ago. In this book he made the statement that the land grants to the railroads from the Federal Government and the various State governments aggregated in area the States of Iowa, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Michigan, and Wisconsin.

I am simply calling your attention to this to assure you that Federal aid to help highway construction is nothing new. Aid in road building has been the established policy of the Government since its foundation, and in addition to providing highways for transportation it is also in aid of the building of post roads.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. As I understand it, this bill does not change the basic law, but simply provides an authorization for two years.

Mr. RAMSEYER. It extends it for two years more.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. And it does not amend the basic law?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Not at all.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, as has been stated by the gentleman from Iowa, the resolution which is now presented comes before you with a unanimous report from the Committee on Rules. It is also rather significant for a bill carrying this tremendous amount of authorization that the bill from the Committee on Rules also comes to the House with a unanimous report from that committee.

I think it is rather significant for the reason it indicates upon the part of the membership of the House a crystallization of sentiment and of opinion very largely in support of this governmental policy of Federal aid to our highways.

This is a comparatively new proposition in Federal policies. The question of Federal aid for highways is a matter that has only been up for consideration in the public mind in a legislative way since about 1907, and the original bill recognizing this principle and authorizing any substantial appropriation for that purpose was only passed by the Congress in 1916. There was originally, of course, a considerable amount of opposition in Congress and out of it to the recognition of this principle of Federal aid for highways.

I think that it is also significant to the growth of public opinion in favor of the proposition, as shown by the report of the Committee on Roads in support of this bill, that the following great organizations composing the elements of public opinion presented their views to the committee in support of the continuation of this policy with ample appropriations. The American Association, the State highway officials, the American Automobile Association, the American Bankers' Association, the American Farm Bureau Federation, the American Federation of Labor, the National Grange, the American Roadbuilders' Association, the National Automobile Chamber of Commerce, and the Chamber of Commerce of the United States.

I dare say that there could not be secured in support of any governmental proposition upon which there was any element of opposition a similar amount of support and indorsement represented by as many great civic and industrial organizations as are recorded in favor of this bill.

Gentlemen, I venture to assert that there is no appropriation made out of the Federal Treasury that is of more real economic benefit and of greater popularity among the people than that provided for in the extension of Federal aid to highways.

There is reason for that. The reason is that this appropriation, wherever it has been the established policy, is not a theoretical proposition, but is a practical proposition; one that brings the substantial benefits of the Government directly to the front doors of the people of the country even in its isolated rural communities.

They not only get the economical benefits from a commercial aspect, but, as I regard it, one of the greatest benefits that come to the masses of the people; the one that has made it so popular among all branches of our people is the fact that it made possible the dissemination of intelligence and information to them—the cultural benefits, the social benefits as exhibited in church gatherings, and the adaptability of the existing system of education, and a number of other lines that I could suggest.

As I was thinking over the problem to-day it seemed to me that one of the great outstanding benefits that has come to the masses of the people of this country is that it affords an opportunity to have brought to their front doors and delivered to them not only the great daily papers of the country but the magazines, the county papers, the farm papers, the labor papers, and all mediums of knowledge to which they wish to subscribe.

Gentleman, it is important in any theory of our Government to have a quick and enlightened public opinion, and an intelligent public opinion must be based necessarily on the facts relating to any particular proposition. So it is with great gratification that I present my humble views in support of this rule and in support of a continuation of this policy.

Some gentlemen seem to have an opinion in some quarters that we have about reached the time when we can abandon appropriations out of the Treasury for the improvement of our highway system. For one I do not accept that view. I believe that the benefits have been so great, and the field in many sections of the country has been so exploited with large highway systems, that for a long number of years the Congress of the United States will be called upon to make a substantial appropriation for this great system. [Applause.]

I think that the people of this country, for the reasons that I have in a limited way suggested, are going to continue by expression of their opinion to instruct their representatives in the House and Senate to continue this appropriation in a substantial sum, not an extravagant sum, until ultimately, as far as our rural transportation facilities are concerned, we will almost reach the ideal system where there will be no section of the country so remote or isolated but that the dwellers and the producers there will have afforded to them and their children the benefits of this great arterial system of communication. [Applause.]

Mr. ARENTZ. Does not the gentleman think that in order to do this it would be necessary to amend this law a little in order to divert some of the funds from the arterial highways to the highways through the countryside that he speaks of?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is a matter of administration, a matter of detail, and as the system progresses in its development that must be worked out by a meeting of the minds between the Federal and the State authorities. I agree with my friend that that is one of the big problems that he has to meet in his section as well as in my own.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. And under the general law that we enacted some four or five years ago there is a definite division, of course, of these funds, the 4 per cent, the 3 per cent, and the 7 per cent highways of the States, so that it does carry the funds to the countryside to a very large extent.

Mr. LOZIER. And is not one of the most wholesome effects of good road legislation and appropriations the unification of the American people, enabling different sections of the Nation to get acquainted with other sections, and creating an era of good feeling and understanding between the respective portions of the United States?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Undoubtedly that is so, and that is covered, as has been suggested, by its cultural as well as its fraternal aspects.

Mr. McDUFFIE. And another very wholesome effect of the building of good roads is the solving of the problem of making farm life attractive, as the gentleman has already said, and thereby preventing the great influx of our people into congested centers, having them remain on the farm satisfied and contented.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I agree with my friend from Alabama that that is entirely true.

Mr. BLANTON. Is not one of the most valuable assets to the rural population the fact that good roads have brought markets closer to farms? They are not so dependent upon the railroads. The farmers and the stockmen in my country are using trucks to carry their calves and yearlings and even grown stock to market 150 miles away.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Not only is what the gentleman says true but what all of these other gentlemen have said, and these various suggestions indicate the composite strength and all of the material advantages bound up in this great system of Federal highways.

Mr. LOWREY. I think the gentleman is very gracious in permitting all of us to make up his speech, but I think the gentleman has omitted one very important item and that is that the consolidation of the rural schools has depended upon the development of the highways. In my State the estimate of the education department is that we have so far done away with the little one-teacher school and that 70 per cent of our pupils are now in the graded consolidated schools, and all along by the country highways are the large school buildings, with auditoriums and a half dozen classrooms, with all the advantages of a high-grade school.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is all very true and a very important feature. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I spoke a moment ago about an enlightened public opinion. That, of course, is very largely dependent upon the press of the country. I think it is due to the press of the country, not only the great city dailies, but the little county papers and the magazines and other trade journals, to say that very largely through their persistent and continuous advocacy of this system has it reached its great popularity with the people and with the Congress of the United States. At the risk of being just a little bit sentimental upon this question of the press, and as a tribute to their great service in this great work, I am going to take the liberty, during the few minutes I have left, of reading into the RECORD an apostrophe, if one may call it such, to the printing press, by Mr. Robert H. Davis:

I AM THE PRINTING PRESS

I am the printing press, born of mother earth. My heart is of steel, my limbs are of iron, and my fingers are of brass. I sing the songs of the world, the oratorios of history, the symphonies of all time. I am the voice of to-day, the herald of to-morrow. I weave into the warp of the past the woof of the future. I tell the stories of peace and war alike. I make the human heart beat with passion and tenderness. I stir the pulse of nations and make men do braver deeds and soldiers die. I inspire the midnight toiler, weary at his loom, to lift his head again and gaze, with fearlessness, into the vast beyond, seeking the consolation of a hope eternal. When I speak a million people listen to my voice. The Saxon, the Latin, the Celt, the Hun, the Slav, the Hindu, all comprehend me. I cry the joys and sorrows every hour. I fill the dullard's mind with thoughts uplifting. I am light, knowledge, power. I epitomize the conquests of mind over matter. I am the record of all things mankind has achieved. My offspring comes to you in the candle's glow, amid the dim lamps of poverty, the splendor of riches; at sunrise, at high noon, and in the waning evening. I am the laughter and the tears of the world, and I shall never die until all things return to the immutable dust. I am the printing press.

[Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL SANITARY CONFERENCE (H. R. DOC. NO. 316)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying documents, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State concerning the request made by the Secretary of the Treasury that an appropriation of $2,500 be obtained from Congress for the expenses, as itemized in the report, of three delegates of the United States to the International Sanitary Conference, which is to meet at Paris on May 10, 1926, for the purpose of revising the International Sanitary Convention of 1912.

I ask of Congress legislation that will authorize the appropriation of this moderate amount for the purpose stated, and the inclusion of the appropriation in the next deficiency act for the fiscal year 1926.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 15, 1926.

FOREIGN SERVICE RETIREMENT SYSTEM (H. R. DOC. NO. 317)

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying documents, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State showing all receipts and disbursements on account of refunds, allowances, and annuities, for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1925, in connection with the foreign service retirement and disability system, as required by section 18 (a) of an act for the reorganization and improvement of the foreign service of the United States, and for other purposes, approved May 24, 1924.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 15, 1926.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein a statement I made this morning before the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I object.

SUBMARINE CABLE ACROSS ST. LOUIS RIVER—PIER AT REHOBOTH BEACH

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 7455) to legalize the submarine cable laid in the St. Louis River at the Spirit Lake Transfer Railway drawbridge, between New Duluth, Minn., and Oliver, Wis., and used for the lighting of the village of Oliver, Wis., and the bill (H. R. 5012) to legalize a pier into the Atlantic Ocean at the foot of Rehoboth Avenue, Rehoboth Beach, Del., with Senate amendments thereto, and concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Dakota asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table certain House bills with Senate amendments thereto, and concur in the Senate amendments. The Clerk will report the bills.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7455) to legalize the submarine cable laid in the St. Louis River at the Spirit Lake Transfer Railway drawbridge between New Duluth, Minn., and Oliver, Wis., and used for the lighting of the village of Oliver, Wis.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Dakota?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the effect of the Senate amendment that has just been read?

Mr. BURTNESS. There is no change at all; it is simply textual in nature.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Has the gentleman conferred with the ranking minority member on the committee which handled this bill?

Mr. BURTNESS. No.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Then I must object only for the reason that if the gentleman will take it up with the minority member of the committee—

Mr. BURTNESS. I took it up with the author of the bill, and, as I say, there is absolutely no change in the bill—

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I think that good parliamentary practice and courtesy requires that the gentleman should consult with the ranking minority member.

Mr. BURTNESS. There is entire accord on the two sides in reference to bridge legislation.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. If the gentleman will give assurance that the minority representatives on the committee are not against the bill, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. BURTNESS. I certainly can give that assurance.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. If the gentleman has not conferred, how can he give such assurance?

Mr. BURTNESS. The gentleman upon the subcommittee handling this legislation is not opposed to this. I think I can say I have discussed this proposition with them.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5012) to legalize a pier into the Atlantic Ocean at the foot of Rehoboth Avenue, Rehoboth Beach, Del.

The Senate amendment was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Reserving the right to object, is this in the same situation?

Mr. BURTNESS. The same situation exactly, simply a change in the language, and all this does is to legalize the maintenance of these structures which were established without permission of Congress in the first place. The Senate did not like apparently the language of the House bill as drawn and as reported unanimously by the committee, and rewrote the language. There is absolutely no difference.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Do the minority members agree?

Mr. BURTNESS. Unquestionably.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLANTON. Why can not this go over until to-morrow morning? It is a quarter past 5 now.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bills H. R. 9688, H. R. 8190, and H. R. 8950 be taken from the Speaker's table, that the Senate amendments be disagreed to, and the House ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bills by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 9688. An act granting the consent of Congress to the construction, maintenance, and operation of a bridge across Sandusky Bay at or near Bay Bridge, Ohio.

H. R. 8950. An act granting the consent of Congress to the State of Minnesota to construct a bridge across the Minnesota River at or near Shakopee, Minn.

H. R. 8190. An act authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Colorado River near Blythe, Calif.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Dakota asks unanimous consent to disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker appointed, as the conferees on the part of the House, Mr. DENISON, Mr. BURTNESS, and Mr. PARKS.

APPROPRIATION BILL FOR THE STATE, JUSTICE, COMMERCE, AND LABOR DEPARTMENTS

Mr. SHREVE, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations, submitted for printing, under the rule, a conference report on the bill (H. R. 9795) making appropriations for the State, Justice, Commerce, and Labor Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1927, with accompanying statement.

SECTION 29 OF THE VOLSTEAD ACT

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request to extend in the RECORD the remarks I made before the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting a statement made by him before the Committee on the Judiciary. Is there objection?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, are those the same remarks that the gentleman referred to a moment ago?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Yes. My request was then objected to.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. For the present, Mr. Speaker, I shall have to object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] is willing, as I understand, to withdraw his objection to my request.

Mr. CONNALLY. I withdraw my objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I want to inquire if it has anything to do with prohibition?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. It relates to the interpretation of the Volstead Act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the Record I include the following:

STATEMENT OF REPRESENTATIVE JOHN PHILIP HILL OF MARYLAND, BEFORE THE SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE OF THE SENATE, THURSDAY, APRIL 15, 1926, AT 10 A. M.

To-day the Volstead Act permits and legalizes cider and wine containing possibly from 2.7 to 11.68 per cent of alcohol. To-day Congress has the power to permit and legalize similar beverages to be sold under proper restrictions for use in the home. Congress has the power to pass such legislation in 10 minutes if it desires.

On January 8, 1926, Gen. Lincoln C. Andrews, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, in charge of prohibition enforcement, made the following statement on the above matter in reference to the Volstead Act: "Section 29 has been interpreted by the courts in the case of United States against Hill and in the case of Isner against United States, and I am satisfied that the court has properly interpreted the law in these cases, which interpretation, as I understand it, amounts to this: That a householder who manufactures in his home for home consumption ciders and fruit juices which acquire by fermentation one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol by volume, but which are not intoxicating in fact, does not violate the law, but that the law is violated if the fermentation process is allowed to proceed to the point where the beverage becomes intoxicating in fact."

The two cases of United States against Hill and Isner against United States settled the law on the immediate power of Congress to so modify the Volstead Act as to permit such temperate beverages as wine and beer when sold under proper restrictions.

The rulings of law in the case of United States v. Hill (vol. 1, 2d ser., Fed. Repts. p. 954) were made on November 11, 1924, in the District Court for the District of Maryland. The decision in the case of Isner v. United States (vol. 8, Fed. Reporter, 2d ser., p. 487) was handed down by the Circuit Court of Appeals, fourth circuit, on October 20, 1925. No appeal was taken from this decision to the Supreme Court on the part of the United States. The decision in this case, confirming the principles of law established in United States against Hill, is therefore binding on every United States criminal court in the Nation, and no appeal to the Supreme Court is now possible.

The eighteenth amendment to the Constitution provides "the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors * * * is hereby prohibited." So long as the eighteenth amendment remains a part of the Constitution, the manufacture of "intoxicating liquors" within the United States is illegal. The law of the United States as fixed in the Hill and Isner cases specifically provides that there may be beverages containing as much as 11.68 per cent of alcohol which are not "intoxicating liquors" and which therefore are not prohibited by the Constitution.

The Supreme Court has decided that it is the duty of Congress to define the words "intoxicating liquors." Congress, in section 29 of the Volstead Act, has made such a declaration, permitting as not "intoxicating liquors" beverages containing considerably over one-half of 1 per cent. Section 29 of the Volstead Act is as follows: "The penalties provided in this act against the manufacture of liquor without a permit shall not apply to a person for manufacturing nonintoxicating cider and fruit juices exclusively for use in his home, but such cider and fruit juices shall not be sold or delivered except to persons having permits to manufacture vinegar."

In the case of United States v. Hill I was indicted under six counts. The first count charged that on September 27, 1924, at Baltimore, I did unlawfully manufacture certain intoxicating liquor, to wit, 25 gallons of wine. The second count charged the unlawful possession of such wine. The third count charged that on September 18, 1924, at Baltimore, I did unlawfully manufacture certain intoxicating liquor, to wit, 30 gallons of cider. The fourth count charged unlawful possession of such cider. The fifth count charged that I maintained a common nuisance at my home by the manufacture of 25 gallons of wine, and the sixth count charged that I maintained a common nuisance at my home when I manufactured 30 gallons of cider.

For over two years I had been attempting, through official channels, to obtain a definition of the word "nonintoxicating" in section 29 of the Volstead Act. The Prohibition Unit had stated, through Judge Britt, its counsel, that the definition of one-half of 1 per cent was the exclusive definition of "intoxicating" and applied to section 29.

I did not believe this decision to be correct, because on April 26, 1922, I wrote to the Federal Prohibition Commissioner and asked him, "Under the national prohibition act, what is the percentage of alcohol permitted by your office for use in the home as 'nonintoxicating'?" I desire also to ask specifically whether cider containing 2.75 per cent of alcohol by volume is permissible for use in the home." On May 2, 1922, the Federal Prohibition Commissioner, Roy A. Haynes, replied, "As at present advised, this office is not disposed to take action against the manufacturer for use in the home of the maker of cider or other fruit juices containing not more than 2.75 per cent of alcohol by volume." This decision, however, was afterwards revoked by the Federal Prohibition Commissioner, and the one-half of 1 per cent definition applied. He revoked it when I asked, "Why not 2.75 beer?" All the correspondence between the Federal Prohibition Commissioner (Mr. Haynes), the Secretary of the Treasury, the Attorney General, and myself on this subject is contained in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, beginning in volume 62, part 2, Sixty-seventh Congress, second session, at page 11456.

In interpreting the existing law the United States district judge said: "The Government contends, and its contention is not without some force, that the words 'nonintoxicating cider' which a person may manufacture for use in his own home must be construed with reference to the definition of the term 'intoxicating liquor' given in the first section, to wit, that it shall not contain one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol by volume. But it is obvious that by the concluding sentence of section 29 of the act Congress intended that persons manufacturing nonintoxicating cider for use in their homes and not for sale should be in a class by themselves, at least in some particulars, otherwise the sentence has no meaning or use whatsoever."

If it was intended to punish persons for manufacturing cider for use in their own homes which contains more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume, there was no necessity for the provision, for the act without the sentence already provided such punishment. If, on the other hand, it was intended by Congress that persons who made cider containing less than one-half of 1 per cent by volume should not be subject to punishment, there was no need for the provision, for the reason that the other provisions of the act did not provide punishment for such persons. The only reasonable explanation for singling out home manufacturers of cider and fruit juices for special mention in this section, to my mind, is that Congress did not intend to subject them to the strict provisions as to the alcoholic content of the product specified in section 1, but intended to prohibit the manufacture of cider and fruit juices for home use, which should be, in fact, intoxicating. If the section is so interpreted, then there is a reason for its insertion in the act. This interpretation of the law is borne out at least to some extent by the discussion in the United States Senate on September 4, 1919, reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD (vol. 58, pt. 5, pp. 4847-4848), when the sentence above quoted, or part of it, was first inserted in the act by amendment. The opinion was then expressed on the floor of the Senate by the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill that the cider and fruit juices prohibited as to manufacture for home use were those intoxicating in fact.

United States District Judge Soper described the wine in question in the following instructions to the jury: "You will consider in that connection the alcoholic content of the liquors. You have heard them given in evidence, and I have already repeated them to you. So far as the wine is concerned, it runs from 3.34 to 11.68 per cent. If, in your judgment, any of that wine was intoxicating, whether or not, in your judgment, all of it was, the charge on the first two counts is made out."

The United States district judge described the cider in question in the following instructions to the jury: "Now, gentlemen, when you come to the third and fourth counts of the indictment the only question for you to decide is whether the cider was intoxicating. Everything charged in these counts is admitted except the intoxicating quality of the product. What I have said as to the definition of intoxication and the comments I have made thereon, qualified, however, by the fact that the highest alcoholic content of the cider was 2.7 per cent, are pertinent to these counts, and you will make up your verdict accordingly."

The United States district judge defined the word "intoxicating" as used in section 29 of the Volstead Act as follows: "Intoxication in this section of the law means what you and I ordinarily understand as average human beings by the word 'drunkenness.' If this wine was capable of producing drunkenness when taken in sufficient quantities—that is to say, taken in such quantities as it was practically possible for a man to drink—then it was intoxicating."

The jury, under this definition of "intoxicating," after 17 hours of deliberation, rendered a verdict of "not guilty" on all counts, and thus legalized beverages of different descriptions having alcoholic contents of from 2.7 to 11.68 per cent.

The case of Isner against United States confirmed the principle enunciated by the United States district judge in the case of United States against Hill. Construing the same section of the Volstead Act, section 29, United States District Judge Webb, rendering the opinion of the circuit court of appeals, consisting of himself and Circuit Judges Waddill and Rose, said: "We were interested in the argument of the Government brief in this case, but are forced to the conclusion that whatever Congress may have meant by inserting the above clause in the prohibition act we are bound to consider and accept the plain language of it. We are forced to the conclusion that Congress intended to take out of the general class of intoxicating liquors nonintoxicating ciders and fruit juices made by one to be used exclusively in his home, and therefore put nonintoxicating vinegar and such fruit juices in a different class, and required that before a person can be convicted under the act for manufacturing such vinegar and fruit juices same must be proved by the Government to be in fact intoxicating."

The United States district judge then continued: "We therefore hold that in all such cases it is necessary to prove that such vinegar and fruit juices are, in fact, intoxicating before a conviction can be had. This view of this section is unanimously held by the court, and, as the writer of this opinion was a Member of the lower House of Congress when this act was passed, he can say without doubt that the foregoing construction of this section was the intent and meaning of Congress. This provision now under consideration was not a part of the bill as it passed the House of Representatives but was inserted in the Senate after a number of speeches had been made by persons complaining that the "grandmother and housewife" were going to be "penalized and made criminals" if they made blackberry cordials or blackberry wines for use in their own homes. In order to meet such objection on the part of such critics of the bill this provision was agreed upon and inserted in the Senate after a conference of Members and Senators deeply interested in the passage of the act and the success of prohibition. A different interpretation than this one placed upon the act would be to totally disregard the plain language of the Congress, which inserted this provision in the Volstead Act for the purpose of making a different rule for conviction of persons who make nonintoxicating vinegar and fruit juices exclusively for their home uses."

If home-made cider and wine containing from 2.7 to 11.68 per cent of alcohol are not intoxicating, in fact, and are legal when made in the home, it is absurd to say that similar beverages are not equally legal and equally not intoxicating, in fact, when made outside of the home if made under Government supervision and sold under Government supervision for consumption in the home or with meals in properly regulated hotels.

To-day the Volstead Act permits and legalizes cider and wine containing possibly from 2.7 to 11.68 per cent of alcohol. To-day Congress has the power to permit and legalize similar beverages made anywhere to be sold under proper restrictions for use in the home.

FEDERAL AID ROAD BILL

Mr. KIRK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD my remarks on the bill H. R. 9504.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. KIRK. Mr. Speaker, I favor the passage of this bill (H. R. 9504) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide that the United States shall aid the States in construction of rural post roads, and for other purposes," approved July 11, 1916, as amended and supplemented, and for other purposes.

The Constitution of the United States guarantees, among other things, that the Nation shall—

- (1) Provide for the common defense.
- (2) Promote the general welfare.
- (3) Establish post offices and post roads.
- (4) Regulate commerce among the several States.

Notwithstanding the authority of this Nation under the provisions of the Constitution above quoted, no definite plan was arrived at until the year 1916, when Congress for the first time passed a Federal road bill, which appropriated $75,000,000 to be spent over a period of five years, in aid to road construction. Congress again in February, 1919, passed another act appropriating $200,000,000 for like purpose, to be spent over a period of three years.

In November, 1921, the third bill was approved, appropriating $75,000,000 for a like purpose, which covered only a one-year period. The fourth bill was approved June 19, 1922. It carried a three-year program—$50,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923; $65,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924; and $75,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925. And thus this Government, under the authority of the Constitution and those laws, stands committed to a national system of Federal aid in the construction of post roads throughout the United States under a definite well-defined policy in connection with the various States of the Union, practically all of which have accepted the Federal-aid system and have provided the necessary funds to meet the demands of the Federal Government, and by so doing are securing from the Federal Government the allotment of Federal aid money due the respective States for building post roads therein.

The method adopted for the distribution of Federal aid money is fixed on the following basis:

One-third according to the ratio which the area of each State bears to the total area of all the States; one-third in the ratio which the population of each State bears to the total population of all the States, as shown by the last available Federal census; one-third in the ratio which the mileage of rural delivery routes and star routes in each State bears to the total mileage of rural delivery routes and star routes in all the States.

This bill under consideration continues this system for a period of two years, appropriating $75,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1928, and $75,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929.

Additional sums are appropriated for forest roads and trails, $7,500,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1928, and $7,500,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929. The total mileage which this system of roads now includes in the States is about 280,400 miles.

The States are leading the Federal Government in expenditures in the building and construction of post roads and highways in the various States.

This Federal aid can be acquired and matched by the tax levied on automobiles and gasoline by the various States, and there is no good reason why any State should not receive its share of the Federal aid money, as they all have State highway departments at this time.

Sixty per cent of the present highway mileage in the Federal system has not been touched.

The Federal Government paid to the States the largest amount of money last year in its history of road building.

The sum expended on all classes of roads for the last year, 1925, was about $1,176,000,000—of this sum, the States expended $596,176,000.

It was said by General Pershing in 1921, that—

The country road will be of tremendous value in time of war—the roads must be relied upon to obtain the needed food supplies.

This is one reason why the Government should aid the States in constructing roads, but this is only one reason—there are many reasons why it should do so.

Good roads affect the general welfare of the Republic.

It furnishes a new artery of commerce between the people of the States and aids in the transportation of the commodities of each.

It brings about a better understanding of the citizens of the various States.

It furnishes a means by which the children of the States may be able to reach the schools which will afford them greater opportunities for an education.

It increases church attendance.

It places the citizens in closer touch with medical service.

It brings about a social betterment in the communities and States.

Horse-drawn vehicles are vanishing and are giving way to the automobile. The present roads served approximately 30,000,816 individuals the last year. Time is being saved and the business world is moving at lightning rapidity. The time for the delivery of the rural mails has been reduced one-half. One-half the expense for gasoline and repairs of automobiles are saved by good roads, and yet in some sections in some of the States the people are shut in from the outside world on account of bad roads.

In the district which I represent, most all the roads are impassable through the winter season. One county in my district has spent $700,000 within the last four years, raised by bond issues by vote of the people for road building. Other counties of my district have also spent enormous sums, raised in the same way to build good roads, and we have only made a start. There is not a foot of hard surface road in my district.

These people, the earlier settlers from Virginia and the Carolinas, as the stream of immigration moved westward, stopped and built their homes and located in the hilly country of Kentucky and adjoining States, where they have lived for more than 100 years. They are isolated and shut off from the outside world. Although their country was rich beyond description in coal, minerals, oil, gas, and timber, yet it availed them nothing because of lack of transportation until the railroads within the last few years entered that section, when a marvelous development began, and to-day dotted here and there throughout that section you see thriving towns inhabited by a happy people, and in the mountains of that section you hear the hum of industry on every hand.

What we need most is the completion of the highways so well begun, so that the products and varied industries may be brought in touch with the markets of the world, and this, together with the influences from without coming in touch with the people of that section, will make it the richest country in the world.

Kentucky needs the help of the Nation to help her complete her roads. Other States likewise need help. The people of these mountains are of the purest Anglo-Saxon blood to be found in the United States. They are true, honest, courteous, and kind; they remember an injustice, and they never forget a friend or a deed of kindness. They are law-abiding, yet they are brave to a fault. They stand for the Constitution and laws of the land. They are full of patriotism and never faltered in defense of the flag. They are by nature religiously inclined. They are shrewd and studious and when given a chance for an education produce some of the greatest minds of America. The latchstring to their door hangs on the outside to all comers, and the stranger is welcome to the hospitality of their home.

I am proud of them. I am proud to be called a "Mountaineer."

It has been said in the past that Kentucky was noted for its good whisky, fine horses, and pretty women. The whisky is not now so good or plentiful, but the horses are just as fine and the women are just as pretty as in days gone by.

The population has doubled within the last 10 years. The strangers, numbered by the thousands, have entered our gates and have been most heartily welcomed. Through this section comes the trail of the immigrant going west—the highways we are striving to build passes over these trails, opening up a gateway from the North to the South. We need to complete them—we want the Government to help us do it.

Good roads, in addition to other virtues named, are great civilizers. All highly enlightened countries of the Old World were road builders. The Romans were noted for their fine roadways. The good roads in France greatly aided the allied armies to win the World War. No great nation can afford to be without them. Certainly the United States should have them. Good roads are emblems of civilization. I hope this bill will pass.

VIRGINIA BILL OF RIGHTS

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I offer a concurrent resolution and ask unanimous consent that it be at once considered. Only a minute will be occupied.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which he presents. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Concurrent Resolution 22 providing for the appointment of a joint committee to represent Congress at the celebration of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the adoption of the Virginia Bill of Rights

Whereas the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the adoption of the Declaration of Rights, written by George Mason and commonly called the Virginia Bill of Rights, is to be celebrated in the city of Williamsburg, Va., the place of its adoption, on the 12th day of June, 1926; and

Whereas the said Declaration of Rights is recognized as one of the great liberty documents of all time; has served as a model for similar statements of fundamental principles contained in the constitution of many of the States of the American Union and in the early amendments to the Constitution of the United States, and has been an inspiration to liberty-loving people throughout the world; and

Whereas it is fitting that the Congress should be represented in the observance of such anniversary: Therefore be it

Resolved, by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be, and is hereby, created a joint committee consisting of 10 members, five of whom shall be appointed by the presiding officer of the Senate and five by the Speaker of the House, to attend said celebration, for the purpose of representing the Congress of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. BLANTON. It was understood that the gentleman from Virginia would state that those who will represent us would pay their own expenses, and that it would involve no expense whatever to the Government. That ought to be understood.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. There is no appropriation provided in the resolution.

Mr. MADDEN. And can the gentleman assure us that there will not be when the Senate puts it in?

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9341) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1927, and for other purposes; that the House had receded from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 10, 11, and 14 to the said bill, and concurred therein; and that the House had further disagreed to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 1 and 5.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to each of the following bills:

A bill (H. R. 9688) granting the consent of Congress to the construction, maintenance, and operation of a bridge across Sandusky Bay at or near Bay Bridge, Ohio;

A bill (H. R. 8950) granting the consent of Congress to the State of Minnesota to construct a bridge across the Minnesota River at or near Shakopee, Minn.; and requested a conference with the Senate on the several disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. DENISON, Mr. BURNETT, and Mr. PARKS managers on the part of the House at the respective conferences.

A bill (H. R. 8190) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Colorado River near Blythe, Calif.—

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to each of the following bills:

H. R. 5012. An act to legalize a pier into the Atlantic Ocean at the foot of Rehoboth Avenue, Rehoboth Beach, Del.; and

H. R. 7455. An act to legalize the submarine cable laid in the St. Louis River at the Spirit Lake Transfer Railway drawbridge, between New Duluth, Minn., and Oliver, Wis., and used for the lighting of the village of Oliver, Wis.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 6730. An act to detach Fulton County from the Jonesboro division of the eastern judicial district of the State of Arkansas and attach the same to the Batesville division of the eastern judicial district of said State; and

H. R. 9398. An act to amend an act regulating the height of buildings in the District of Columbia, approved June 1, 1910.

MUSCLE SHOALS

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I have here a short article on Muscle Shoals which I would like to have printed in the Record. It appears in the Locomotive Engineers' Journal for April, 1926.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

SHALL THE POWER TRUST ENSLAVE THE SOUTH

Every engineer in the country has a vital interest, both as a railroad man and as a taxpayer and consumer, in the action of the Congress authorizing the securing of bids to turn the South's greatest natural resource over to a private corporation.

"If I were greedy for power over my fellow men," says a former Secretary of War, "I would rather control Muscle Shoals than be continuously elected President of the United States." For Muscle Shoals, on which the Government has spent over $150,000,000 of your money, and mine to develop a great hydroelectric power plant, controls the industrial development of the whole southern Mississippi Valley. The man or corporation that gets Muscle Shoals will be the power king over one of the richest and most undeveloped sections of the United States, embracing 13 States and 20,000,000 people.

The largest hydroelectric power dam in the world has been built by United States Army engineers at Muscle Shoals, harnessing three times as much water as tumbles down Niagara Falls and capable of producing up to 3,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours of electric energy a year. If this gigantic power is developed by the Government and sold to the people at cost it will add to the comfort of every home, stimulate the advancement of agriculture, and create a great industrial civilization throughout the Southland. But if Congress hands the Muscle Shoals power monopoly over to a private corporation, whose sole aim in grabbing it is to make profits, the new South will be at the mercy of this power king, who can make or ruin its industries by juggling the cost of electric power. For cheap power is the lifeblood of industry. The rich natural resources and potential raw materials of the South can never be developed without it.

The one logical private bidder for Muscle Shoals is the General Electric Power Trust. Through its Electric Bond & Share Co. it now controls 1,700 power companies in 40 States, including the Alabama Power Co., now buying from the Government some of the power generated at the giant shoals plant. It is futile to talk of the Government "regulating" this power octopus and compelling it to charge fair prices. The cold fact is that Government regulation of a private monopoly is always a failure, because the monopoly keeps the books. Indeed, the only possible way for the Government to offset the present throat hold of the Power Trust on the American people is for it to operate the Muscle Shoals plant in competition with the rates charged elsewhere by the private monopoly, and thus prove how cheaply super-power can be produced.

The Government is now generating electricity at its Panama Canal plant for three-tenths of a cent a kilowatt-hour, while it has to pay private plants from 10 to 16 cents per kilowatt-hour at various Army camps throughout the country. While the publicly owned Panama plant is too small and too far away to curb the rates charged by the Power Trust, the Muscle Shoals plant is not. The friends of the Power Trust in the Congress attempt to deceive the farmers by stating that the private monopoly receiving Muscle Shoals will have to make cheap fertilizer for them from the nitrate produced. Leaving aside the facts that the cyanamide process of producing nitrogen from the air has now been superseded by cheaper methods, and that at best only a small part of the giant power generated at Muscle Shoals would be used for making fertilizer, the Power Trust would never sell the farmer anything at a loss, and for every penny he saved on fertilizer he would lose a dollar on higher power bills.

Perhaps some Journal reader in the far North will say: "What has all this to do with my job and my bank account?" Just this: Cheap electric power from a publicly owned Muscle Shoals will create an industrial prosperity in the South that will radiate throughout the continent, shipping its products over your railroad and mine, decreasing the cost of many of the necessities of life that you and I have to buy, and curbing the Power Trust in the prices it charges us for electric light and power in our own homes.

It is not too late to prevent the rape of Muscle Shoals by private interests. Write now to your Senators and Representatives in Washington protesting against it. Remind them that they are pledged by the act of Congress creating Muscle Shoals plant to run it as a public property, and that even the commission of power experts appointed by the act of the last Congress recommended Government ownership as the wisest solution. The resolution just adopted calls for bids as good as that offered by Mr. Ford, which was about 6 cents on each dollar of the taxpayers' money invested, to say nothing of the real worth of the plant.

We make bold to prophesy that if this Congress should betray its previous pledge and ignore the national interest by turning Muscle Shoals over to a private monopoly, it will thereby create a scandal besides which the corruption of Lorimer and Newberry, of Doheny and Fall, will sink into insignificance. Sooner or later the people will realize the enormity of such a betrayal and will surely visit condign punishment on those faithless public servants responsible for it.

CLAIMS AGAINST THE GERMAN GOVERNMENT (S. DOC. NO. 99)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitted in response to Senate Resolution 199 (submitted by Mr. KING and agreed to April 14, 1926), communicating to the Senate certain information relative to American claims against Germany, which, with the accompanying paper, was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

PAYMENT TO WILLIE PERRY CONWAY

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Comptroller General of the United States, reporting, pursuant to law, relative to an expenditure alleged to have been made without authority of law, to one Willie Perry Conway for retainer pay as a de facto transferred member of the Fleet Naval Reserve, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. WARREN presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Thermopolis, Wyo., remonstrating against any modification of the prohibition enforcement law, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I desire to have printed in the Record and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary a telegram and certain resolutions adopted in protest against any modification of the Volstead Act.

There being no objection, the telegram and resolutions were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Mr. STANFIELD also, from the Committee on Civil Service, to which was referred the bill (S. 786) to amend the act entitled "An act for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes," approved May 22, 1920, and acts in amendment thereof, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 604) thereon.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2305) to correct the military record of Sidney Lock, reported adversely thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. GERRY:

A bill (S. 3999) to provide a parole commission for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. SWANSON (by request):

A bill (S. 4000) to reimburse R. B. Miller and to repay to him for overcharge in freight on manganese shipments paid by him to the United States Railroad Administration; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. MOSES:

A bill (S. 4001) granting a pension to George A. Shaw (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. REED of Pennsylvania:

A bill (S. 4002) granting a pension to Hannah Cowan; and

A bill (S. 4003) granting a pension to Margaret Cowan; to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (S. 4004) to amend the World War veterans' act, 1924; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. WILLIS:

A bill (S. 4005) to provide a permanent government for the Virgin Islands of the United States, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions.

A bill (S. 4006) for the relief of George W. Allison (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Claims.

CITIZENSHIP OF INDIANS

Mr. DILL introduced a bill (S. 3998) making eligible to citizenship North American Indians born outside the United States, which was read twice by its title.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I wish to say just a word. At the present time North American Indians born on this continent outside the borders of the United States are not admissible to citizenship under the immigration laws. I do not believe it was the intention of Congress to make such people ineligible to citizenship, and the purpose of the bill is to correct that condition. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Immigration.

The motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENTS TO PUBLIC BUILDINGS BILL

Mr. MOSES, Mr. BRUCE, Mr. SWANSON, and Mr. PITTMAN each submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them to the bill (H. R. 6559) for the construction of certain public buildings, and for other purposes, which were severally ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

TRAVELING EXPENSES OF CERTAIN SENATORS

Mr. COPELAND submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 201), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the Senate to all Senators whose term of office commenced on the 4th day of March, 1925, and who actually traveled from their homes to be in attendance during the special session of the Senate called by the President to convene on said day, and were not paid mileage as Senators or Members of the House of Representatives during the session of Congress immediately preceding, the amount usually paid to Senators as mileage for attendance upon a regular session of the Congress.

PRINTING OF MADISON DEBATES OF THE FEDERAL CONVENTION, ETC.

Mr. FESS submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 13), which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Whereas the Declaration of Independence of the 13 United States of America was proclaimed on the 4th day of July, in the year Anno Domini 1776, whereby the United States assumed "the separate and equal station among the powers of the earth to which the laws of nature and of nature's God entitle them"; and

Whereas the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the Declaration of Independence is to be celebrated in 1926 throughout the length and breadth of this "Indestructible Union of Indestructible States," now happily 48 in number; and

Whereas through the government of the Federal Union established on the 4th day of March, in the year of our Lord 1789, under the Constitution of the United States the principles of the Declaration of Independence were rendered effective and representative government made its formal entry into the world; and

Whereas the movement for a revision of the Articles of Confederation so as to "render the Federal Constitution adequate to the exigencies of the Government and the preservation of the Union" was conducted by James Madison, of Virginia, later a delegate to the Federal Convention and fourth President of the United States, to whom there is no public monument at the seat of government of the Nation, and by Alexander Hamilton, of New York, later a delegate to the Federal Convention and first Secretary of the Treasury under the Constitution, in commemoration of whose services a bronze statue, erected by the private munificence of an anonymous donor, was recently placed on the steps of the National Treasury; and

Whereas the safety of republican institutions admittedly and proverbially depends upon the frequent recurrence to first principles; and

Whereas the representative government of the States of the American Union organized under the Federal Constitution is threatened without and its principles are inadequately known and appreciated within the United States by multitudes of our fellow citizens enjoying its inestimable benefits; and

Whereas an authentic and accurate account was kept by James Madison of the proceedings in the Federal Convention in which the Constitution was framed, the texts of the debates and proceedings of which could be published in one small volume and ought to be widely distributed as a public document, together with the Declaration of Independence, the Articles of Confederation, the Constitution, the instructions to the delegates to the Federal Convention, the instruments of ratification of the States, and the texts of the amendments to the Constitution: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there shall be compiled, printed with illustrations, and bound as may be directed by the Joint Committee on Printing 10,000 copies of the Madison Debates of the Federal Convention, together with the Declaration of Independence, the Articles of Confederation, the Constitution, the instructions to the delegates to the Federal Convention, the instruments of ratification of the States, and the texts of the amendments to the Constitution, and other relevant and pertinent historical documents for distribution in the year 1926 in commemoration of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the Declaration of Independence of the United States of America, to the end "that government of the people, by the people, for the people shall not perish from the earth," of which 3,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 7,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATIONS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives receding from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, Nos. 10, 11, and 14, to the bill (H. R. 9341) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1927, and for other purposes, and further disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 1 and 5.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments still in disagreement, request a further conference with the House thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Vice President appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. SMOOT, and Mr. OVERMAN conferees on the part of the Senate.

PARK AND PLAYGROUND SYSTEM OF THE NATIONAL CAPITAL

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8830) amending the act entitled "An act providing for a comprehensive development of the park and playground system of the National Capital," approved June 6, 1924, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. CAPPER. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments, agree to the conference asked by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Vice President appointed Mr. CAPPER, Mr. JONES of Washington, and Mr. KING conferees on the part of the Senate.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I would like to inquire if there is any Senator who desires to proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, the Italian debt settlement bill. If not, I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the public buildings bill.

Mr. FERNALD and Mr. McLEAN addressed the Chair. The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine. Does he yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. FERNALD. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McLEAN. I would like to inquire of the Senator from Utah if he expects the Senate to adjourn to-morrow and to have a call of the calendar on Monday.

Mr. SMOOT. I see no reason why we should not.

Mr. McLEAN. I think there are many important matters on the calendar which Senators are anxious to have disposed of.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to an adjournment to-morrow.

Mr. McLEAN. Under the circumstances I think it would be well to have that understood, if possible.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I would like to call up the conference report on House bill 9795.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9795) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1927, and for other purposes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The report was read yesterday. I understand that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] has something to say with reference to the report.

Mr. McKELLAR obtained the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. What is the status of the public buildings bill now?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The unfinished business is the Italian debt settlement bill. Any Senator can demand the regular order. At the same time the bill (H. R. 6559) to provide for the construction of certain public buildings, and for other purposes, at the request of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD], is before the Senate for consideration.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I understood that I had consent for the consideration of the conference report on the bill making appropriations for the Departments of State, Justice, and so forth.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair laid the conference report before the Senate and, without objection, it will be proceeded with.

Mr. HARRISON. I merely want to find out the status of the public buildings bill, because I am very much opposed to it.

Mr. FERNALD. That bill is before the Senate. I yielded to the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] to enable him to call up for consideration a conference report.

Mr. HARRISON. I had understood that merely the motion had been made to take up House bill 6559, the public buildings bill, but that the motion had not been acted upon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The public buildings bill was laid before the Senate last night by unanimous consent.

Mr. BRUCE. That was my understanding.

Mr. OVERMAN. There were only half a dozen Senators here at the time. I do not like that way of doing business. Senators ought to be here when such important matters are laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the objection of any Senator the regular order of business, which is the Italian debt settlement bill, can be brought before the Senate. The public buildings bill can be laid aside on the objection of any Senator.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it seems to me that the Senator from Maine, with his sense of fairness, ought not to avail himself of the permission which was given to take up the public buildings bill this morning when only a handful of Senators were present, and many of those who object to the bill were absent at the time. He ought to renew his request this morning and allow the consent which he obtained last night to be set aside under the conditions to which I have referred.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, this bill has been on the calendar for nearly four months; it is next to the Italian debt settlement. I have been trying to have it considered here for the last 60 days. Yesterday afternoon I asked and received unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill, and I can not withdraw the request now.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The business before the Senate, under the regular order, is the Italian debt settlement. Upon objection, the consideration of the bill referred to by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] will be set aside.

Mr. HARRISON. Then a call for the regular order will displace the public buildings bill, and I call for the regular order.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8132) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the war with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, or the China relief expedition, to certain maimed soldiers, to certain widows, minor children, and helpless children of such soldiers and sailors, and for other purposes.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE STATE AND OTHER DEPARTMENTS

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is the Italian debt settlement bill—

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I understood—

The VICE PRESIDENT. But, under the unanimous-consent agreement, the conference report submitted by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] is before the Senate, and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, it was my understanding that the conference report was really before the Senate by unanimous consent. The Senator from Maine has no objection to having it now taken up, I presume.

Mr. FERNALD. I yield for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The conference report is before the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9795) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1927, and for other purposes.

[For conference report see RECORD of yesterday's proceedings, Senate, p. 7498.]

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate for only a few moments in my discussion of the conference report.

The bill as it passed the House contained the following language:

(11) Investigation and prosecution of war frauds: The unexpended balance on June 30, 1926, of the appropriation "Investigation and prosecution of war frauds, 1926," is continued and made available for the same purposes, and for the employment of regular assistants to United States district attorneys (not exceeding $100,000) if that amount is not needed for the investigation and prosecution of war frauds, during the fiscal year 1927: Provided, That not more than one person shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $7,500 per annum.

Mr. President, the Senate struck out that provision but the committee of conference has restored it. Before the vote shall be taken on the adoption of the conference report I merely wish to let Senators know exactly what the adoption of that item would mean. Last year, over my earnest protest and the protest of many other Senators, a million dollars was appropriated for the prosecution of war frauds. My recollection is—and if I am wrong about it, I hope the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] will correct me—that about $300,000 of that appropriation has already been spent, and this is a proposition to appropriate the unexpended balance of last year's appropriation. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No.

Mr. KING. Yes; that is right.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from Tennessee is wrong about that.

Mr. McKELLAR. What are the exact figures? I am not wrong about the appropriation of last year and the appropriation for this year, but the exact amount I do not carry in my mind, and I should be glad to have the Senator from Washington supply it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The adoption of the conference report as to that item will mean that there will be reappropriated at the end of the fiscal year about $300,000. That will be the amount which will be available.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask the Senator if it is not the intention to discontinue this activity?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is the intention to close up the work very soon; but this was the situation that was presented to us by the other House, and I think very properly so: This item in the bill as it came from the House had been stricken out by the Senate, and if that action had been agreed to, then there would have been nothing with which to prosecute the cases as to which the department is now practically ready to bring suit. Then the people involved would have been notified that after the 1st of July there would be no further prosecutions, and therefore they would have staved off all of these cases. That was the situation that confronted the conferees, and, of course, I am satisfied the Senator from Tennessee does not want a situation like that to be brought about.

Mr. McKELLAR. If that were the correct situation, I would not; but I am sure that that is not the correct situation. The correct situation about that matter is this: Those in charge of the war frauds section secured an appropriation of a million dollars last year and have used only a part of it. They are making no headway in the matter of collections. They tried only three lawsuits in nearly a year, as is shown by the hearings. They obtained a judgment for $14,000 in one case, a judgment for $111 in another case, and a judgment for $85 in a third case. They employed about 46 lawyers to obtain those three judgments. They also effected some compromises.

The truth of the business is that when the matter is examined into, eliminating that portion of the work that has been done in the War Department, which is substantially the same work, it will be found that the war frauds section has been a cost to the Government for the entire time and that we have not got back what we appropriated. As a matter of fact, the only purpose of this appropriation is to furnish jobs for a number of gentlemen in that branch of the service. It will not be one particle of benefit to the Government. Nothing has been accomplished by those gentlemen. They have merely built up a large force, and they want to continue it over another year. That is what the adoption of this report would mean—that and nothing else. It would not be for the advantage of the Government but it would be for the advantage of those who are holding those jobs in the war frauds section. They are accomplishing nothing, as I have pointed out time and time again.

The Senate by an overwhelming vote, as I remember, or perhaps by unanimous consent, struck out the item when the bill was under consideration after the statement was made. Now, here it comes back from the conference committee in the old way, just as many things of that kind happen. I am not reflecting at all upon the conference committee. I have no doubt that these gentlemen appeared before the committee and made an ex parte statement, and that upon that ex parte statement the committee was moved to restore the item. I think it ought not to be restored. I think the conference report ought to be sent back to the conference committee. I think the Senate should insist upon its amendment. Therefore, Mr. President, I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment and ask for a further conference with the House of Representatives thereon.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, before the Senator from Tennessee concludes, let me inquire whether the three judgments to which he has referred represent the entire amount accomplished by this great force, or whether they also made settlements and adjustments that yielded the Government a considerable return? That is the important consideration.

Mr. McKELLAR. Including what the similar section in the War Department did, and other items, they make a more favorable report; a very much larger sum has been collected, but a year ago the two managers of this section—and I think they were getting $10,000 a year and building up a great legal organization there—came before the committee. I asked for a statement of what they had collected for the preceding seven months of that year, and they gave it to us, and that report showed that, while they had an appropriation of $500,000 for the whole year for that specific section, they had collected $171,000 in round numbers, $14,000 by one judgment, $85 by another judgment, and $111 by a third judgment. Compromises constituted the remainder of the $171,000.

Mr. LENROOT. To how much did the compromises amount?

Mr. McKELLAR. They amounted in round numbers to $156,000, and the judgments to fourteen thousand and some odd dollars.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not mistaken. The gentleman to whom I have referred supplemented the statement later, but they gave that as their testimony. It can not be misunderstood. The truth of the matter is that the only good that is being done by this appropriation is to the officeholders who occupy positions in the war-frauds section. The item in the bill ought not be agreed to. The Senate thought it ought not to be agreed to and struck it out of the bill, but now the conferees have put it back. It ought not to be put back.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from Tennessee is out of order. The question before the Senate is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee is right in part, but he does not go far enough. According to the testimony which was taken before the committee in 1925, the collections for the six months of that fiscal year up to January 1, 1925, were $157,581.19, and then there were judgments amounting to $14,191.65; but for that entire fiscal year the collections by this branch of the Government amounted to $3,217,731.65. We can not judge the accomplishments of a collection agency of this kind by merely picking out a certain period of time and citing what was done during that period. We can not judge the collections for a fiscal year by taking merely a part of that fiscal year.

Mr. SMITH. What was the total amount collected by this agency?

Mr. JONES of Washington. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, the collections were $3,217,731.65. The total collections since this agency was created amount to something over $10,000,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; but that was done in the earlier stages of the proceedings, Mr. President.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The $3,217,731.65 to which I have referred were collected during the one year I have mentioned. I have here the figures showing the collections by this agency.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Is it not a fact that the War Department had a very active and intelligent organization, which worked for a number of years and collected and settled claims amounting to tens of millions of dollars?

Mr. JONES of Washington. But, Mr. President—

Mr. KING. I am not through. Is it not also true that the War Department agency after adjusting the accounts of a large number of persons with whom business had been done turned into the Treasury as a result of those efforts on their part a great many million dollars?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The War Department collected $4,719,295.88.

Mr. KING. I am referring to the War Department.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The amount I have named is what the War Department claimed to have collected.

Mr. KING. They collected more than that, let me say to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of Washington. This is the amount that was claimed to have been included in the collections made by the Department of Justice.

Mr. KING. But anterior to that they collected tens of millions of dollars.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Possibly so.

Mr. KING. Many of those collections were brought about by reason of the fact that there was some dispute as to the accounts upon one side and the other, and it was only a matter of bookkeeping and a matter of adjustment. The War Department agency had almost ready for settlement a number of other cases, involving six or eight million dollars, whereupon the Department of Justice stepped in—

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. KING. Wait a moment. We provided appropriations for the Department of Justice, which created this organization and took over the work which had been almost completed by the War Department. It now claims credit for the work which had been done by others.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No, Mr. President; the Senator is mistaken. The War Department collected every claim that it possibly could collect and adjusted every claim that it possibly could adjust.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President—

Mr. JONES of Washington. If the Senator will wait just one moment; of these it collected something like $4,719,295.87; but when the War Department came up against a claim that it could not settle, that it could not adjust, that it could not bring to a conclusion, it turned it over to the Department of Justice, of course. So that these claims that came over to the Department of Justice were not claims that were ready for settlement, but they were claims that the Department of War could not adjust or settle.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator whether it is not absolutely true that we appropriated last year $500,000 for the war frauds section of the War Department?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Approximately; yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. They are still cooperating, and these collections represent what both sections have been able to collect.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; the Senator is wrong about that.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I am not, Mr. President.

Mr. JONES of Washington. This $10,638,386.74 collected by the Department of Justice does not include a single dollar collected by the War Department—not a dollar. That is over and above the adjustments by the War Department.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President—

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. How much of this was collected by compromise and how much did they give away to get this amount?

Mr. JONES of Washington. That I do not know. There were compromises. There were adjustments.

Mr. CARAWAY. Did they give away more than they got?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I suspect that they have settled claims that originally involved probably more than they got. That is very likely so.

Mr. CARAWAY. How much did they collect by suit? Does the Senator know?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; I can not tell how much was collected by suit.

Mr. McKELLAR. Practically none, Mr. President; substantially none.

Mr. JONES of Washington. O Mr. President, they have collected quite a good many cases by suit; but even granting it to be true that they did not collect by suit, here is the situation at the present time, at any rate, with reference to these suits, which would be abandoned if this amendment had been finally accepted in conference:

On January 20, 1926, there were 463 cases open on the docket of this section.

That is, the war frauds section.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator why he says that they would be abandoned if this amendment were accepted.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Because there would be no appropriation to carry on the work after the 1st of July.

Mr. CARAWAY. Have we not the Department of Justice, whose duty it is to prosecute suits brought by the Government?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. Have we not district attorneys in every district?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; but these men are not acquainted with the facts of these cases. They would have to start in again, and we would have to employ additional assistants and United States attorneys.

Mr. President, I want to say that I expressed myself on the floor of the Senate when this matter was inaugurated. My judgment then was that it would be wiser to let the past go; that the chances were, I thought, that we would probably spend more than we would collect. I have been mistaken in that. We have collected four or five times as much as we have spent in doing it, so that we are just that much ahead. We have spent about $2,000,000, and we have collected over $10,000,000 that we might have expected to be a loss. I think that is a profitable transaction. We now have confronting us a situation where there are three or four hundred cases that they have practically gotten ready to bring to a conclusion. If an amendment like this is adopted, if this conference report is rejected, these cases will be abandoned and the people who are contesting them with the Government will be notified that after the 1st of July we do not propose to press these claims. What will they do? Why, of course they will postpone settlement until after the 1st of July, and it will all be gone.

We may not get a great deal out of it. I do not know. We have been getting out of it rather more than we have spent, and as long as we can carry on things in that way we are making money.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, what cases are there that will go over, and how many lawyers are involved? Will it take all 46 lawyers to look after these cases that are going over? There are 46 lawyers, according to the latest report, that are to carry over these several cases. We know, and the Senator has admitted, that 46 lawyers were engaged for seven months of the time in trying three lawsuits.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; I have not admitted anything of the kind.

Mr. McKELLAR. The two representatives of this section swore to that, and there can not be any doubt about their testimony.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not know how many cases there were during the whole year. I know that the Senator has picked out certain facts within a certain period that do not represent the actual situation during the whole year. Instead of collecting about $171,000 for the fiscal year, we collected over $3,000,000; whether by suit or compromise or final adjustment does not make any difference. There has been collected over $3,000,000 instead of $171,000.

Now with reference to the force, here is the statement:

There were 45 attorneys paid out of this appropriation during the current year, now employed at the seat of government, and eight attorneys in the field; total, 53 special assistant attorneys in the service at the present time. In the hearings it is stated that they expect to reduce this force to 27 attorneys, 9 stenographers, 22 accountants, and 4 clerks.

In other words, they expect to cut this force practically in two. They are cutting down the force, and that is cutting down the appropriation, and all in the world that we do now is to reappropriate the balance that may be left for next year, which will probably amount to two or three hundred thousand dollars; and, as I say, we are confronted with this situation: If we cut off all of this appropriation, we practically notify these people that we do not propose to press these claims at all.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, instead of doing that, why do they not arrange to turn them over to the Attorney General of the United States, and give him, say, $100,000 extra for the purpose of completing these cases. Why keep this enormous number of attorneys—27 of them, as the Senator now claims—that are going to be on the rolls during the coming year? Why keep those 27 lawyers for another 15 months to look after several undefined cases that may bring the Government two or three hundred thousand dollars? I believe that is the statement that the Senator made.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; I did not make any statement like that.

Mr. McKELLAR. What was the statement? How much will these claims involve?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I started to read them a moment ago when the Senator interrupted me. I will tell him what the total is.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be very glad to hear it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator whether this appropriation that is continued, $300,000, is merely to pay the salaries of the attorneys, or does it cover expenses?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It covers all the expenses, stenographers and accountants, and so on. In other words, it does practically what the Senator has suggested. It turns this work over directly to the Attorney General to carry on with his regular force; and then, as it is brought to a close, these people will go out. These two men who had charge of it, who submitted these facts and data, expect to leave the Government service in a very short while.

Now, with reference to the business as it is pending:

On January 20, 1926, there were 463 cases open on the docket of this section. Of those, 108 cases, involving over $77,000,000, were in suit.

Of course, we do not know how much will be collected. We can not tell.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, how much have they collected?

Mr. JONES of Washington. They have collected altogether over $10,000,000. Of course, we have spent about $2,000,000. That is what it has cost us to collect this amount of a little over $10,000,000. It is very natural that the easier cases are closed first. The cases that can be adjusted by compromise are settled, and it is only what we might call the hard cases that go to trial.

Mr. WHEELER. How much of the $10,000,000 have they collected by compromise, and how much by suit?

Mr. JONES of Washington. That I can not tell the Senator. I just assume that possibly the majority of them have been collected by compromise.

Mr. WHEELER. Does the Senator know how many cases were compromised?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; I do not. I do not remember those details. I think probably they appear in the hearings. The House went into this matter very fully and closely; and the House, in making the provision that it has made in this bill, did not follow the suggestion of the department. It did not follow the suggestion of these attorneys. It framed this up on its own initiative, according to the way it thought the work ought to be carried out.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] asked how many cases had actually been tried. In all the testimony that has been taken for the last two or three years about this war-frauds section, does the Senator recall a single other case that has been tried except the three reported by Mr. Michael and Mr. Andrews, who reported that three lawsuits had actually been tried, in one of which there was recovered a judgment of $14,000, in another one a judgment of $115, and in a third a judgment of $85? Does the Senator recollect the statement of a single other lawsuit that has actually been tried during all this time by this great corps of lawyers?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have not been very much concerned with the number of cases that were actually tried. What I have been concerned about is as to whether or not it has paid the Government to spend the money that it has spent in trying to adjust these claims and collect them for the Government. We have spent about $2,000,000, we have collected over $10,500,000, and if we had not provided for carrying on the work of this section the chances are about ninety-nine out of a hundred that we would not have gotten anything out of it.

Mr. McKELLAR. This appropriation began in 1923 with 500,000, $500,000 more was appropriated in 1924, $700,000 in 1925, and last year $1,000,000.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; but that has not been spent. We have spent for this service, in round figures, $2,000,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. This item only appropriates the unexpended balance.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is all.

Mr. McKELLAR. I know; but it is the Government's money, and why misuse an unexpended balance? This money will come back into the Treasury on July 1 if it is not thus wasted, and it ought to be restored to the Treasury. I want to say that in my judgment—and we examined these witnesses before the committee—not a dollar will be brought into the Government's coffers if we allow it to be expended. We are throwing away $300,000 of the people's money in voting for this item.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Now, Mr. President, I want to read this statement, which was prepared by the Attorney General:

On January 20, 1926, there were 463 cases open on the docket of this section (the war-frauds section). Of those, 108 cases, involving over $77,000,000, were in suit.

Most of these cases are in suit still.

The investigation of 60 cases, involving claims aggregating more than $11,000,000, had been completed. Since that time additional actions have been instituted and additional investigations have been completed. If the present program of this section is adhered to other actions will be instituted and other investigations completed prior to June 30, 1926.

That is, June 30 of this year.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President—

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will ask the Senator please to wait one moment.

We have estimated that on that day between 150 and 200 cases will still be open on the docket of this section. If they are abandoned the Government will fail to recover large sums which are justly due it, and the money theretofore expended in their investigation and prosecution will have been entirely wasted. Some of these cases involve actual fraud.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. How long have they been on the docket at the present time?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not know. These have not all been on any docket except the docket of this section. The docket referred to is not the docket of the court.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator a question. Does the Senator think that cases now just being prepared for trial are going to be wound up in the next 12 months, or by July 1, 1927? The Senator is sufficiently familiar with litigation to know that it will not be done. Exactly that same plea can be made a year from now.

Mr. JONES of Washington. They will be wound up, Mr. President, if the Senator from Tennessee has his way about it—

Mr. McKELLAR. They certainly will be.

Mr. JONES of Washington. And they will be lost to the Government. Every possible hope that the Government may have of collecting any of this money will be gone. In other words, Mr. President, while the Senator does not intend it, if what he advocates is carried out, no greater service could the attorneys of these people render to their clients than would be accomplished by that, because it would mean the abandonment of their cases, and they would not have further need for attorneys or defense or anything of the sort.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, does the Senator actually mean that the Department of Justice would let the Government's cases be dismissed for want of prosecution unless we hired special attorneys to handle them? That seems to be a pretty broad indictment against the Department of Justice.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not yield to the Senator any further now.

Mr. CARAWAY. I do not care whether the Senator does or not.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have the floor.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator can not keep it always, though.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from Arkansas will proceed in his own time, if he desires to do so.

I have not made any indictment against the Department of Justice. The Senator knows that the Department of Justice has no more attorneys in its regular force than are necessary to carry on the regular business of the department. We know further that if we abandon this section, these cases will be abandoned, or we shall have to provide an additional force for the Department of Justice. We shall either have to do that or the department will have no force greater than is necessary for its regular work, and I do not think we can assume that they have more than they need. If they had, of course, we ought to cut the force down. That is why I say these cases will have to be abandoned. In the first place, in a great number of the cases lawsuits have not been commenced.

They are about ready to bring the cases into court. Does any Senator think that if we abandon this war-frauds section, which we created for the specific purpose of prosecuting these cases, the Department of Justice will go on with the cases which are just ready to be brought into court? I think they have a right to assume that the Congress does not want them to abandon the cases, but if we do not agree to this provision, it seems to me they will have to come here and say, "We must have an additional force." They now have men who are trained in this line of work—men who are acquainted with the work; men who know the facts and know the circumstances upon which the Government claims are founded.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, the Senator knows, does he not, that if these cases had been properly handled they should have been brought a long time ago, but that instead of being properly handled, they were switched from the Department of Justice to the War Department, and from the War Department back to the Department of Justice, for a number of years?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; the Senator does not know that they have not been properly handled. Probably mistakes have been made. Very likely mistakes have been made, but I have too much confidence in the men who are attempting to carry on the affairs of the Government to think that they are generally deficient, that they are generally influenced by this motive or that.

It may be that some of them are not as efficient as they ought to be; probably that is true. It may be that some of them have made mistakes; probably that is true. It may be that some of them have been neglectful; probably that is true. But I think we have a right to assume that, as a whole, these men are competent and that they are trying to do the very best they possibly can for the Government, that they are handling these cases in the very best possible way. We must not overlook the fact that the people against whom these claims exist will employ, and no doubt in some instances have already employed, the ablest attorneys possible to get, paying them large fees.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. NEELY. The Senate struck this item from the bill. May I inquire of the Senator what argument was presented or what facts were submitted to the managers of the conference that impelled them to reverse the action of the Senate and restore the item to the bill?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, we were met by the House conferees at once with the statement, "If your amendment prevails, much of the work that has been done will have been wasted already; many of the claims which are practically at the point of having suit brought will be abandoned, and there will result great loss to the Government." The House committee has gone into this whole situation in the greatest detail, and the members were unanimous in the belief that the approval of this amendment of the Senate would mean a very serious loss to the Government.

Mr. NEELY. The managers on the part of the House had no information other than that which is contained in the hearings, had they?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I suppose not. They had gone into the matter far more fully than the Senate committee had. Of course, we had their hearings, and we had this additional statement from the Attorney General.

Mr. NEELY. Does the Senator believe that the information contained in the record of the House hearings justifies the conclusion that the conferees have reached regarding losses that would probably result from our failure to agree to the restoration of the provision under consideration?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do, absolutely. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the Record a letter and memorandum from the Attorney General, answering in detail many of the very questions which were raised in the discussion before, and which have been raised now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., March 30, 1926.

HON. WESLEY L. JONES,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I inclose herewith a memorandum submitted to me by the directors of the war transactions section of this department, relative to the action of the Senate last Saturday in striking from the act making appropriations for this department for the next fiscal year all provision for the investigation and prosecution of cases arising out of war transactions.

In view of the fact that the directors of the war transactions section were charged on the floor of the Senate with having misrepresented to me the collections made in cases involving war transactions, and since I know that charge to be entirely unfounded, it seems to me that in fairness to them the inclosed memorandum should be inserted in the Record, so that the charge will not be permitted to stand unanswered.

I hope that you will agree with me.

Sincerely yours,

JNO. G. SARGENT, Attorney General.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
WAR TRANSACTIONS SECTION,
Washington, D. C., April 1, 1926.

HON. WESLEY L. JONES,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The Attorney General has requested me to send you the inclosed memorandum, which is a copy of the memorandum referred to in his letter to you dated March 30, 1926.

Very truly yours,

JEROME MICHAEL, Director.

(Inclosure.)

MARCH 29, 1926.

Memorandum for the Attorney General

On Saturday the Senate eliminated from the appropriations bill all provision for the investigation and prosecution of war frauds in the next fiscal year. During the course of the debate we were charged with having misrepresented to you the facts regarding this section's collections, and other inaccurate statements were made.

THE STATEMENTS

1. Up to date "only a little over $300,000" of the current appropriation of $1,000,000 has been expended and "the bill reappropriates the sum of about $700,000."

2. This department asked "that the unexpended balance be reappropriated for another year."

3. This section did not collect $3,217,731.65 in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, as the Attorney General reported to the Senate, but "somebody has been imposing upon the Attorney General" and "it is impossible that the figures can be correct."

4. The figure of $3,217,731.65 was arrived at by adding the collections made by the War Department "to the miserable pittance that the war-fraud section of the

THE FACTS

1. As shown by the record of the hearings before the subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee (p. 160), which was available to the Senate, the expenditures to December 31, 1925, the first six months of the current fiscal year, were $316,726.39, and (p. 161) as the expenditures of the section are at the rate of approximately $52,500 per month the estimated expenditures for the entire fiscal year are about $700,000. The bill, therefore, reappropriated about $300,000 instead of about $700,000, as a most cursory examination of the record of the hearings before the House committee would have shown.

2. This department did no such thing. This department estimated the requirements for the next fiscal year at $250,000. The Budget reduced the estimate to about $211,000. Instead of providing for the appropriation of a specific sum the House committee recommended the appropriation of the unexpended balance of this year's appropriation entirely, as we are informed, upon their own initiative and without suggestion from this department.

3. The figures are correct and no one has imposed on the Attorney General. In February, 1925, we stated to the Senate Appropriations Committee that from July 1, 1924, to January 30, 1925, the section had collected $157,581.19 and had obtained judgments aggregating $14,191.65. These figures were cited to the Senate last Saturday as proof of the statement that the collections from July 1, 1924, to June 30, 1925, could not have been $3,217,731.65, and they were used in such a manner as to create the impression that we have given the Senate and the Attorney General conflicting information. The fact is that the collections from January 30, 1925, to June 30, 1925, were sufficient to bring the total for the entire fiscal year to $3,217,731.65. We attach an itemized statement of the collections in question.

4. As inconceivable as it may be, the figure of $3,217,731.65 is correct and includes no collections made by the War Department.

Department of Justice has collected, namely, $171,000, and the two added together amount to the figures given by the Attorney General," and "the only way in which it can be conceived that the figures of the Attorney General are correct is that he has included the collections made by the War Department through compromises."

5. "The only way the Attorney General's figures can be accounted for is that he has been misled about the matter"; and "they [Messrs. Andrews and Michael] testified themselves that they had not collected any such sums."

6. "Most of the funds collected by the Department of Justice were from cases that had been practically settled by the War Department." "There were a number of cases ready to be settled, and the Department of Justice stepped in and got the credit."

7. "The Department of Justice never did collect $8,000,000 out of fraud cases. It did collect a small amount, a few of the cases being based on fraud, some merely on contracts; but the greater part of the amount collected by the Department of Justice resulted from negotiations which had been conducted by the War Department, and the War Department was practically in a position to close the matters when they were turned over to the Department of Justice perhaps for drawing the proper releases and entering the judgments, so that the matter would be fully concluded."

The House Appropriations Committee took more than 50 printed pages of testimony concerning the work of investigating and prosecuting war frauds, past, present, and prospective. It is inconceivable that if the Senate had been familiar with that testimony we would have been charged with having imposed upon you, or that statements so inaccurate as those we have commented upon would have been made or permitted to pass unchallenged.

As we have already asked you to permit us to return to private practice by the end of the present fiscal year, we are concerned by the action of the Senate only because of our interest in the work to which we have given almost two years and of our desire to see the rights of the Government maintained. As we understand it, if no appropriation is made for the purpose of investigating and prosecuting cases arising out of war transactions in the next fiscal year, the department will have to abandon that work altogether because of the lack of the funds necessary to carry it on. If that is so, the action of the Senate will have the following results, which we deem it our duty to call to your attention:

1. If the action of the Senate becomes the action of Congress it will become known, upon the passage of the appropriation bill, that no funds will be available next year for the purpose of investigating and prosecuting war frauds. Under those circumstances defendants will endeavor by every means to delay the trial of their cases and will refuse to negotiate with this department for their settlement. It will thus become extremely difficult, if not impossible, to obtain trials or settlements during the remainder of this fiscal year. That raises the question whether, if the work must end, in any event, on June 30, 1926,

5. The Attorney General has not been misled. His figures can be accounted for by the fact that they are absolutely accurate, and we have not testified other than in accordance with the fact that the collections for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, were $3,217,731.65.

6. It has been the almost invariable practice of the War Department not to refer cases to this department until the War Department, after exhausting all possible means open to it, has been unable to adjust them, and wherever it has been possible for the War Department to settle a case it has done so, unless the case involved actual fraud. The cases referred to the Department of Justice are those which the War Department has been unable to settle.

7. In cases arising out of war transactions this section has collected to March 22, 1926, $10,226,769.40, and on that date there was payable to the Government, in addition, $411,617.34 on account of compromises theretofore closed, making a total of $10,638,386.74. Since March 22, 1926, this section has agreed upon additional compromises aggregating approximately $125,000. These collections did not result from negotiations conducted by the War Department. If the War Department had been in a position to settle them, they would not have been referred to the Department of Justice. In addition to the $10,638,386.74 collected by this section, the War Department has collected $4,719,295.87 (Hearings before House committee, p. 349), no part of which is included in the collections made by this section.

it is not advisable to stop it now, or at least very materially to modify the present program of this section, and to confine its efforts to cases in which the work of investigation has been completed. The cost of maintaining the section at the present time is in excess of $50,000 a month. There would certainly seem to be no point in continuing to investigate cases which must be eventually abandoned. Furthermore, if the work of this section in the trial and settlement of cases is to be rendered largely abortive by the knowledge that the work must end on June 30, 1926, further expenditures will be largely wasted.

2. On January 20, 1926, there were 463 cases open on the docket of this section. (Hearings before the House committee, p. 207.) Of those, 108 cases, involving over $77,000,000, were in suit. The investigation of 60 cases, involving claims aggregating more than $11,000,000, had been completed. Since that time additional actions have been instituted and additional investigations have been completed. If the present program of this section is adhered to, other actions will be instituted and other investigations completed prior to June 30, 1926. We have estimated that on that day between 150 and 200 cases will still be open on the docket of this section. If they are abandoned, the Government will fail to recover large sums which are justly due it, and the money theretofore expended in their investigation and prosecution will have been entirely wasted. Some of these cases involve actual fraud.

3. In the last week five new cases have been received from the War Department. We understand that 13 other cases will be received during the present week. These 18 cases are said to involve approximately $6,000,000. These cases, and any others that may hereafter be referred to this department by the War Department, must likewise be abandoned.

4. We think it safe to say that by the end of the present fiscal year at least $11,000,000 will have been collected by this section in cases arising out of war transactions. The result of the abandonment of the cases which will be open at the end of the present fiscal year will be to discriminate against those war contractors whose contracts were first reached in the investigation of war transactions and to permit a very considerable number of war contractors to retain moneys to which they have no right.

Respectfully submitted.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator if the time has not about arrived when the statute of limitations will bar these claims? It seems to me that there must be a time when they will be barred. Perhaps some of them are based on contracts under seal, and that may save them from the running of the statute, but unless suits have been brought already, or will be brought soon, I imagine the statute will run against many of the claims.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I dare say that is true. Just in brief, it seems to me that Congress can not afford to take a position which would be equivalent to saying to these defendants, "After the 1st of July we do not propose to prosecute the claims against you, and if you can just hold out until the 1st of July you will go practically scot-free." I do not think Congress can afford to take that position, especially in view of the fact that with the expenditure of a couple of million dollars we have collected already for the Government out of these claims, which probably almost all of us considered practically hopeless, nearly $11,000,000.

I think the conference report should be agreed to.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, if the courteous Senator from Washington has concluded, so that somebody else may have a right to say a word, I should like to be heard.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator can proceed just as long as he desires.

Mr. CARAWAY. I have not yielded to the Senator to say that.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I thought I would give the Senator some information.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is the only information the Senator has given so far, and I accept it, because he did not have a line of information about how many of these cases had been prosecuted or how much of that work was due to the energy and skill of the men he wants to keep on the pay roll. He had nothing of that kind to tell the Senate. He merely made the bald declaration that it would mean an abandonment of suits if Congress did not continue to keep these men on the pay roll after years of their being on the pay roll. It is rather remarkable that the Senate had all the information that is included in the House hearings when it struck out the provision, and nobody ever thought about that not being compelling until, for some reason, we find the provision back here, with no additional information to justify its being in the bill.

I do not know whether the Department of Justice are to be trusted or not. The Senator seems to think they can not do anything without hiring special attorneys. He ought to know them better than I do; they belong to his particular party, and that party put them in office. If they are absolutely useless, the country ought to know it, and the Senator from Washington could perform one service in all of his long career by telling the country so.

I do not know what is to come out of continuing these people on the pay roll. The Senator a moment ago said that all the easy matters had been settled; that is, those which could be handled without effort; that with the expenditure of $2,000,000 they got back nearly $10,000,000. We might have turned it over to any collecting agency and have beaten that. They would have taken it on a commission of 10 per cent and would have gotten us more money with less expenditure.

There is nothing in the results accomplished to warrant the continuation of these people on the pay roll, and there is not a line of information in the statement of the Senator from Washington which would warrant us in continuing them, because he has disclaimed, whenever he was asked the question, knowing anything about it, except that there are fifty-odd men on the pay roll, and for God's sake keep them there.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Washington if it is not true that this is not a final report of the conferees. There are some other matters to be considered, are there not?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; this is a final report.

Mr. McKELLAR. Was everything agreed to? I asked the clerk a moment ago, and I understood from him that two matters had not been agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Since the Senator reminds me, I will state that it is a complete agreement except that there are one or two items which had to go back to the House under their rules. If the House agree to them, then it will be a final agreement.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the report had to be sent back to the House for action, it seems to me that we might well send it back to conference and let it be further considered by the conference committee. There is no reason why that should not be done. It is not a final transaction yet.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Will the Senator permit?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If the House should agree to what the House conferees recommend, it will be final.

Mr. McKELLAR. So, if the Senate were to agree, it might be final, but it is still in conference, as a matter of fact, and there is no reason why the report should not go back to the conferees.

Mr. President, I want to say just a few words about this appropriation before it is finally voted on. This is the third fight we have had over these appropriations. I think it was some two years ago when Mr. Michael and another gentleman came before the committee asking for an increased appropriation of $700,000, and that was given in the deficiency and in the regular appropriation bill.

Naturally I wanted to know something about what this organization was doing, and, as I recall Mr. Michael's testimony, it was substantially to this effect, that at that time they had 46 lawyers, and they wanted to employ about 110 or 115. They wanted to double their organization. They had an accountant at a tremendous salary. I have forgotten exactly what it was, but I believe one accountant was getting $18,000 a year. There were numerous other accountants. There was all this vast corps of lawyers, a number of them getting about $10,000 a year at that time, and many of them getting $7,500. It was a very costly and expensive organization.

Mr. Michael was asked to bring the facts and figures as to what they were doing, and in order that the exact results could be obtained, I asked him for the data as to the period between July 1 and February 1 of that fiscal year. It was then that the startling information was given that this vast array of 40-odd lawyers had tried three lawsuits, and, so far as the record shows and so far as their testimony shows, as I recall it, not a single other lawsuit has been tried during all the years this war-frauds section has had control of that work.

Think of it, Mr. President, 46 lawyers trying three cases, two magistrate court cases, in one of which the judgment was for $115 and in the other a judgment for $85 and in one a real judgment of $14,000.

They had also collected in that seven months about $156,000 more. When confronted with these facts they were told, because I so advised them in the hearings, that war was going to be made on them if they did not produce better results.

Notwithstanding that testimony the next year, or perhaps it was that very same year, there came in a recommendation from the President of the United States and from the economical Budget Director for an appropriation of $1,725,000 for the war-fraud section. They were going to get lawyers from everywhere to help them, I suppose, to try those three cases. They always said they had some cases they were going to bring, but apparently they have not brought them, or if they have brought them, they have not mentioned them. They have accomplished practically nothing except in the way of a compromise, and that compromise has cost the Government, according to the figures of the Senator from Washington, fully 20 per cent of the amount of the claims. As the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] said, they could have given the claims to a collection agency and no doubt could have obtained tremendously better results at half the cost.

The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] says the attorneys ought to be kept on for another year because the cases are not closed. We will have exactly the same proposal another year that we have now, that there are still cases on the docket undisposed of, and that they must have another appropriation for the war-fraud section to carry on. As long as these gentlemen are retained in office there will be recommendations from the Budget Director and from the President of the United States, notwithstanding his economy program, to keep these men on the pay rolls of the Government. It is a situation for which there is no warrant. I do not like the idea of keeping 27 lawyers on the pay roll who have collected only the insignificant amounts that are involved after these long years. The idea of keeping them on the pay roll and continuing cases that may or may not be tried when the whole 46, or 55, as the Senator from Washington said, have tried but three cases that we know about and then secured only one judgment of $14,000 in all those cases. It is willful, woeful waste and extravagance. It ought not to be countenanced by any legislative body. It is a matter that ought to be stopped, and there is but one way to stop it, and that is to stop it now.

If we stop it now we will save the $300,000, and if we do not stop it now we lose that much, and a year from now there will be in some form, by some means, a recommendation from the Department of Justice to keep these very lawyers on the pay roll in that or some other capacity. It ought not to be countenanced, and I hope the Senate will vote down the provision.

This is not a final report, and we have plenty of time to consider it. There is no reason why it should not be sent back to conference for further consideration. I regret that it is not within the rules to make a motion to refer it back to the conferees with instructions, but there seems to be no such motion permissible under our rules. Therefore I can only hope that the Senate will join me in defeating the conference report. We have plenty of time to take the matter up and save this small sum. Comparatively speaking, $300,000 is a small amount, but when we know it is going to be wasted in the way that has been shown here we ought to save it for the American people.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I merely wish to add a few words to the suggestions already made by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR]. If any business in the country had been handled in the way the war frauds section of the Department of Justice has been handled, it would be bankrupt. There is not a lawyer in the Senate to-day, if he examined into the records of the Department of Justice and the way in which they have handled these war-fraud cases, who would not say that every lawyer connected with that department was either entirely incompetent to handle the business or else there was something wrong with the way it was handled.

I want to say to the Members of the Senate before they pass upon this question that there has been some talk about settlements. The section did make some settlements. I tried to look up a moment ago the figures of one settlement to which reference has been made with some motor company in Detroit for something like $1,000,000, when the evidence showed beyond a question of doubt that the Government was entitled to recover and could have recovered something like $9,000,000. Yet we are paying to these attorneys in the Department of Justice something like $300,000 or $400,000 to go out and compromise an indebtedness due the Government, an indebtedness which is justly due, which it was admitted was due the Government, for $1,000,000, when there was something like $9,000,000 or $10,000,000 due and collectible.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does not the Senator believe, with the facts before him and before the Senate as they are, that one real, genuine, good lawyer with a good stenographer could get more out of the compromises of all these cases than this whole body of lawyers have demonstrated that they are able to get?

Mr. WHEELER. I do not think there is any doubt in the world but that two or three good, competent, first-class lawyers would have handled the matter and settled the cases or tried them a long time ago. The evidence before the committee investigating the Department of Justice showed the fact, and showed it beyond a question of doubt, that these cases were first investigated by the War Department. Then they would be sent over to the Department of Justice. After they were sent there the Department of Justice would go into a long investigation of them, and then they would be sent back for some reason or other to the War Department and another investigation would be ordered there. So they were shifted from one department to another department until some of the claims at least got so old and stale that perhaps no lawyer could get at what the real facts were or could get the witnesses to prove the cases.

I say that if we had an Attorney General of the United States who was competent and who had some assistants down there who were competent, it would not be necessary to go out and employ so many lawyers at an expense of $300,000 for the recovery of this money. Just as long as the Congress of the United States is willing to appropriate $300,000 a year for this purpose, just so long will we have these 26 lawyers down there coming to Congress asking for an appropriation and still saying that the cases are pending. The cases ought to have been closed up long ago. The evidence in most of the cases was found in the War Department and then the cases were sent over to the Department of Justice for further investigation. They have simply mismanaged them from the very start. It has either been done through incompetence or a willful mismanagement of the cases. I for one want to see the appropriation cut out completely. We are simply wasting $300,000 of the people's money by appropriating it in this way or permitting it to be appropriated for this purpose.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, when the Department of Justice appropriation bill was before the Senate a few days ago attention was called to the enormous appropriation carried for the Attorney General's office and for the employment of an army of attorneys and assistants to the Attorney General. For the Department of Justice, as I now recall, more than $13,000,000 were appropriated. Congress has generously provided for legal help in all the Federal districts, and the number of district attorneys, assistant district attorneys, special assistants, and assistants to the Attorney General, great as it is, becomes larger each year. To aid in enforcing the law and detecting crime there are hundreds of marshals and deputies, and also an investigation bureau which has a large personnel and extensive machinery.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Fess in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will ask the Senator if it is not true that the excuse given for this appropriation is that there are quite a number of suits yet to be brought and which ought to be brought, and another year is required for their prosecution or settlement? Is it not true that every suit which will be brought must be brought by the district attorney of the district in which the defendant lives; that district attorneys will have to bring the suits anyway; and that special assistants can only aid in the matter? Is not that true?

Mr. KING. That ought to be the practice, and the district attorneys ought to look after the cases referred to by the Senator. Unfortunately, politics too often plays a part in the selection of district attorneys and their assistants, resulting in the appointment of some incompetent officials. This results in the appointment of many special assistants, who go into States in which they do not reside to take charge of and try cases arising in such States. Then there are special assistants for post-office cases, special assistants for narcotic cases, special assistants for counterfeiting cases, special assistants for deportation and fraudulent naturalization cases, until we have a list of assistants which is formidable if not imposing. There are enough regular district attorneys and their assistants to properly handle all cases and matters of a legal nature in which the Government is a party or is interested.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator will remember that during the Democratic administration the United States district attorneys throughout the United States almost without exception handled all these cases. They would sometimes be worked up by special agents of the Department of Justice, and then the cases would be sent out to the United States district attorneys and they would handle the cases themselves. They did not have and were not required to have a big staff of special assistants and politicians traveling all over the country for the purpose of bringing these suits.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator is right.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President—

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. BRUCE. I desire to say that in the State of Maryland the abuse of employing special assistants in the city of Baltimore became very flagrant and finally led to the enactment of a law positively forbidding the employment of special counsel under any circumstances. The legal staff of the city solicitor's office in Baltimore is a considerable staff, and yet, as I said, special counsel were employed so frequently and at such great expense to the city that finally the legislature came to the conclusion that a positive and unqualified interdiction of the practice should be enacted, and it was enacted.

Mr. KING. The United States might well profit by the example of Maryland. But an examination of the appropriation bills for the past 9 or 10 years will show an enormous increase in the number of Government attorneys—both in the Attorney General's office in Washington and in the various districts throughout the country. And, as stated, there are scores, if not hundreds, of special attorneys and special assistant attorneys and assistants to the Attorney General, and the list grows and the costs increase. I believe that there are in the Department of Justice, as there are in all other departments of the Government, too many employees and not enough efficiency.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I merely want to make the comment that during the investigation of the Department of Justice we found one lawyer who was paid something like $10,000 and who had not done one single piece of work, except he said that he was ready to try the case at any time they asked him to do so. They had paid him $10,000, but he had never done one thing.

In many other instances we found that these special assistants to the Attorney General were representing the Government in one case and representing some defendant in another case. In many instances they were nothing more than political friends of the Attorney General, and on one hand they would be prosecuting a case for the Government while on the other they would be defending a case for some criminal.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I believe that the laws of the United States should be enforced and that funds should be provided for that purpose, but I have felt that there has not been economy in the law-enforcing branch of the Government. I have insisted that the Department of Justice should have sufficient funds with which to enforce the laws.

I have been very much interested in trying to have the antitrust laws enforced, and have conferred with the Department of Justice upon various occasions with reference to this matter. I met Mr. Daugherty, the Attorney General, shortly after his appointment, and stated that I felt sure that whatever money the Department of Justice required to enforce the laws I was sure Congress would appropriate, and that the Democrats would cordially support such appropriations.

The Democrats did vote large appropriations to the Department of Justice, including many hundreds of thousands of dollars to enforce the Sherman and Clayton Acts. I regret that the antitrust laws were not enforced and much of the money appropriated for their enforcement was wasted. Senators are familiar with the record, and I shall not stop to examine it.

However, it is not improper to add that trusts and combinations in restraint of trade increased in number and in power; combinations in restraint of trade and mergers of great corporations were organized to a greater extent than during any similar period of time in the history of our country.

If Senators are interested in the appropriations provided for the Department of Justice for the next fiscal year they will find on examining the bill recently passed that enormous sums were appropriated for assistants to the Attorney General and for special attorneys. I felt when the bill was under consideration that Congress was too liberal. I did not challenge the item because I did not want it said that any Democrat had opposed law enforcement or refused adequate appropriations for that purpose. I believed that the amount appropriated was too much and that it would not be wisely or economically used, and that some incompetent and inefficient men would be selected for responsible positions.

Mr. President, turning to the subject before us, permit me to say that immediately after the war charges were made, particularly by Republicans, that frauds had been committed by various persons and corporations in their dealings with the Government under war contracts. The Attorney General, as I recall, declared that if he had sufficient appropriations he would convict many persons of crimes growing out of war transactions. He and other persons stated that many contractors had robbed the Government, had made false reports, and committed frauds which had resulted in losses to the Government of hundreds of millions of dollars. The House of Representatives made investigations, taking volumes of testimony; many sensational charges were made, and the country was led to believe that nearly all persons who have dealt with the Government had been guilty of perjury and fraudulent practices.

It transpired that most of the charges made were wholly baseless, and that in other cases there were honest disputes between the Government and contractors which subsequently were amicably settled, the Government in some instances being found to be in the right, and the contractors in the greater number of instances being found to be bona fide creditors and entitled to further payments by the Government.

Undoubtedly there were some frauds, and some conscienceless scoundrels took advantage of the situation which the war created and deliberately robbed the Government. The Department of Justice was allowed large sums for the purpose of investigating war contracts and war-fraud cases and to enable it to take the necessary steps to protect the interests of the Government, to bring civil suits where necessary, and to institute criminal proceedings where the facts warranted such course.

May I say that after the partisan declamations of the Attorney General it was discovered that the overwhelming number of persons who had war contracts with the Government lived up to the same and were acquitted of any moral obliquity or any legal transgression. The fact is that many partisan Republicans tried to play politics out of the war and out of the conduct of the war. The real fact, however, is that a majority of those in official positions and who represented the Government in making the war contracts were Republicans, and that the majority of those who had contracts with the Government were likewise Republicans.

After several years of effort, or lack of effort, whichever it may be, of the Department of Justice and its army of experts and agents and attorneys and assistant attorneys and special assistant attorneys there were, as I recall, but two convictions of persons charged with war-fraud cases. One person was convicted of a misdemeanor and fined a few dollars, and the other was an Army officer, I think of the Reserve Corps, who was charged with having improperly secured or disposed of an automobile.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. BRUCE. Was the Army officer who was arrested a guest of Gen. Smedley D. Butler?

Mr. KING. The Senator is venturing upon rather delicate ground, in view of what is occurring at San Diego, where General Butler is now stationed. He was not the officer to whom I referred. A short time before the automobile transaction which I have just mentioned, General Butler was in Haiti and he was active in expelling the Haitian National Assembly from its quarters; he then locked the doors and prevented the Haitian national legislature from meeting. Later he was engaged in the quiet Quaker City of Philadelphia. I notice that he is now writing for publication his achievements and perhaps his defenses, for the edification of the wets and the dries. Where next he will appear I do not venture to predict. The Senator from Maryland must use his imagination in fixing his next field of operation.

But we will dismiss General Butler.

Mr. President, as I was saying, after all the noise and bluster and charges and partisan cries of Mr. Daugherty and other foolish and partisan Republicans, only two persons were found who had violated the criminal statutes. I shall not say that there were not more persons who were guilty of violations of the law. It may be that the Department of Justice failed in its duty because of a lack of interest or gross incompetency. In my opinion, and that is the opinion of many, there were some flagrant violations of the law and there were some persons who should have been sent to the penitentiary because of their transgression.

Be that as it may, the Department of Justice spent many hundreds of thousands of dollars—indeed several millions of dollars—in its war-fraud activities. The appropriations made did not bring adequate results. A few earnest and competent lawyers, with the necessary accountants and investigators, could have accomplished far greater results than are to be credited to the Department of Justice, and the war-fraud section which it set up in the department.

It should be said in this connection that the War Department, soon after the armistice, undertook the settlement of the thousands of incomplete transactions between it and persons and corporations who had furnished the Government billions of dollars' worth of supplies, munitions, equipment, materials, and commodities, which were necessary in the prosecution of the war.

The sudden termination of the war produced a remarkable situation in our industrial life. Thousands of contracts, involving hundreds of millions of dollars, had to be terminated by the Government, though the contractors and subcontractors were ready and willing to complete their contracts. Supplies and raw materials aggregating tens of millions of dollars in value were in the hands of contractors, to be used by them in the execution of their undertakings to the Government. To adjust all of these complicated transactions were a stupendous task. The War Department set up a section, or organization, which addressed itself with the utmost vigor, and, so far as I have learned, in a fair and honorable way, toward an adjustment and settlement of these myriad questions and complicated matters.

Thousands of cases were promptly settled. In some instances it was discovered the Government had a credit; but in most instances it was found that the Government was indebted to contractors and those who had furnished supplies of various kinds. In a number of cases, relatively small, measured by the aggregate number of transactions, the minds of the parties could not meet and suits were instituted. In practically all controversial matters the War Department, through the agency which it set up, ascertained the facts, prepared the evidence, and referred to the Department of Justice the matter of bringing the appropriate legal action. Even after some of the matters had been referred to the Department of Justice, the War Department succeeded in settling the cases, thus avoiding suits, or, if suits were brought, avoiding the necessity of trials.

The fact is that the Department of Justice has played an insignificant and unimportant part in settling the cases growing out of the war. It can not claim credit for the collection of ten millions of dollars, as stated by the Senator from Washington [Mr. Jones]. Through its efforts it has effected a few settlements, but, in my opinion, if the agency set up by the War Department to settle these cases had been left alone it would have settled them long before this, and with greater advantage to the Government.

The record of the Department of Justice in handling the so-called "war-fraud cases" is not a very creditable one. We were told more than a year ago that if Congress would give it another year and a large appropriation, which was, as I recall, $1,000,000, it would wind up the work before it and go out of business. The organization in the Department of Justice still exists. It wants three or four hundred thousand dollars more, and has nothing to indicate that when Congress prepares the next general appropriation bill demands will not be made for another large appropriation for the same organization. Its life will be extended like all other governmental agencies. It will claim immortality.

I shall vote to reject the conference report, hoping that if the bill goes back to conference the item in question will be stricken from the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state for the information of the Senator from Utah that the motion of the Senator from Tennessee was declared to be out of order.

Mr. McKELLAR. We shall have to vote down the conference report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. KING. Then, I shall vote in the negative on that question.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I wish to say that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] has rendered a great service to the country in fighting this war-frauds item. For three years I have stood with him faithfully in the fight he has made, as he knows, both in the committee and in the Senate; but, Mr. President, I am a member of the conference committee on this bill, and I am bound to say that I obtained some enlightening information regarding the item after talking with the head of the war-frauds section, who, as the Senator knows, is a Democrat and a splendid man. He has resigned and is going back to New York to his practice, and had no reason not to tell me the truth about it.

Because of the fight which the Senator has made, in a short time this bureau is to be abolished. They did not spend $300,000 of the money appropriated last year, which is in their favor, on account of the fight the Senator made. So they have $300,000 left over, which is all they ask to wind up this bureau. There are $77,000,000 involved in pending suits, and the gentleman to whom I have referred and in whom I have great confidence tells me that it is absolutely necessary, in his judgment, to leave this board undisturbed for a short time and to allow them to have the unexpended balance in order that they may conclude their work on these cases. Then the Attorney General, in July, 1927, can proceed as the Senator from Montana and the Senator from Utah say he ought to proceed.

I say that the service which has been rendered in this connection by the Senator from Tennessee has been admirable and has brought about this state of affairs. I voted in the Senate with the Senator from Tennessee on this item, but in conference the members of the committee on the part of the House brought in testimony and arguments to show that the appropriation should be continued, and when the gentleman who is at the head of this bureau, in whom I have such great confidence, and who, as I say, is a good southern Democrat, told me it is absolutely necessary to have the amounts proposed to be appropriated I must say that I felt inclined to yield my opposition.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just one moment? The Senator recalls that several years ago I made a similar fight against the annual appropriations for the so-called Council of National Defense. I think it had not met or operated for a long time. The Senator recalls that it took about three years finally to separate that organization from the pay roll of the Government. I have been in the Senate about nine years, and so far as I recall the Council of National Defense organization is the only bureau, section, department, or independent commission of any kind that has ever been separated from the Government pay roll after it has been organized. The Senator from North Carolina has been here more than twice as long as I have, and I want to ask him if he remembers any organization once established, except the Council of National Defense, that has ever been separated from the pay roll?

Mr. OVERMAN. Very few of them; and about half of them ought to be abolished.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why, of course.

Mr. OVERMAN. I was just complimenting the Senator on what he has been doing, not only in regard to the Council of National Defense but in regard to the very thing that we have before us now. I want to extend it for only six months and let them carry out their policy because, I am told by one of the best Democrats in this country and as able a man as there is in this country, a good man at the head of that section, that in his judgment it is absolutely necessary.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for all he has said, but I want him to use the knife this time. Let us see that this is the second one of the utterly useless and extravagant bureaus that are taken out. It is almost like pulling eyeteeth to abolish any section or division or organization of any kind after it is once established.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is the reason why I congratulate the Senator—because he has succeeded.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have not succeeded yet.

Mr. OVERMAN. This section is going to be abolished. No more appropriations will be made for it. This is the end of it; so I say that the Senator has accomplished a great deal, and that is the reason why I am complimenting him.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does not the Senator know that by some means within the present year these gentlemen who are now on the pay roll are going to find some way of circumventing the situation and that they will come back before the Congress and ask to be kept there another year?

Mr. OVERMAN. No. If they do, the Senator and I, who are on the committee, will stop it.

Mr. McKELLAR. We can not stop it if we divide our forces.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes, we can, because the promise is made by the Attorney General that it will be done. It will be only a short time when the whole thing will be wiped out, if the Attorney General, as the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] has suggested, will attend to his business as he ought to do, and have able men to attend to it, and not special attorneys. But these men are preparing these cases, and know them thoroughly, and they think they can collect a great deal of money for the Government; and I have confidence in these men. They have abolished half the force now. They will abolish all the force in a short time. Why not give them a trial for six months, and let us see what they can do? We have been giving them a million dollars. They did not spend it all. They have a large part of it on hand. All that we are giving them is just what they did not spend. We are not giving them any new appropriation.

Mr. McKELLAR. I know; but does not the Senator recall that when Mr. Andrews and Mr. Michael, the joint heads of this department—each receiving a salary of $10,000, as I remember—were before the Appropriations Committee two years ago, I said to them just exactly what the Senator is saying to me now: "If you can not show results I am going to use every effort within my power to have your organization done away with by not giving it an appropriation?"

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator has succeeded now in doing exactly that.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I have not progressed that far. They have come back now without results; in fact, they came back the very next year and demanded $1,725,000 to build up an organization of lawyers all over the country. To use their own expression, they wanted to comb the country with a fine-tooth comb and get the very best legal talent possible to go on with these very cases. They said they were going on with them then. They have not done it. They have not been filed.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator has stopped all that.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; at the last moment they want another year now in which to file some more suits.

Mr. OVERMAN. No, no.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think we have gone far enough. Let us apply the knife now, and put them out of business.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator from Tennessee will yield to me, the Secretary of War takes these cases first, and has his lawyers and his accountants go over them; and if they can not collect them they send them to the Attorney General.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER. That is true. Every one of these claims is taken up first by the War Department, and its legal advisers pass on them. Then they go over to the Department of Justice, and when they get over there in many instances the Department of Justice takes another year or six months to investigate those same identical cases.

Mr. OVERMAN. I agree with the Senator. That is the reason why I have been making the same fight that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] made here for two years, and I stood with him; but now we have this sort of a condition—

Mr. WHEELER. Let me interrupt the Senator once more. These cases now have all been worked up by the Department of War; and all that it should be necessary to do, if the Department of Justice have competent United States attorneys, as they should have, and as they can get if they want them, and not politicians, is to turn these cases over to the United States district attorneys, and they can try them.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have great confidence in the head of the section, Mr. Michael, who, as I say, is one of the most splendid men I know.

Mr. McKELLAR. But he is going to leave.

Mr. OVERMAN. He has quit the department. Therefore I believe what he tells me, because he is going to leave and give up his salary.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will permit me just a moment, this gentleman who is going to leave is a delightful gentleman, as the Senator says; and we can imagine how he feels about these 46 lawyers who are now on the pay rolls, and several accountants, and a number of other officials to help them. They have about as much help as they are in numbers themselves. We can imagine how he feels. He feels kindly toward those who have been under him, and he wants to help them out. He just wants to provide for them for another year out of the kindness of his heart; but ought the Senate of the United States, with full knowledge of the waste and the extravagance that is contained in this provision, to give away the people's money to these favored gentlemen who have already been favored for a long time at the expense of the Government?

Mr. OVERMAN. No, Mr. President; I do not think so. I believe, as Mr. Michael tells me, that if this work is continued they can collect millions of dollars more by spending this $300,000. I have confidence in him.

This is the condition of the matter: The bill has gone back to the House of Representatives with this provision struck out in the Senate. The House would not agree to it. The House had the testimony there, and they would not agree to it.

Mr. McKELLAR. It never has gone to the House. It has not been voted on by the House.

Mr. OVERMAN. In conference, I mean.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; in conference; but the House has not voted on it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am telling the Senator how the matter stands to-day. It is out of the bill now. It went to conference. There were splendid men on the conference committee who had investigated this matter ten times more thoroughly than we had. They took months to do it. Every one of them says it is absolutely necessary to keep this work going for the next six months. The 27 lawyers are to go out. The leading members are to resign, and they say it is worth while to expend this sum for six more months. Why should we not do it? If we send the bill back to the House of Representatives, they will never agree to our action. They are going to stand by the action of their conferees.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let us give them a chance to represent the people for a little while.

Mr. OVERMAN. We did give them a chance in the conference committee in fighting over this very item. Of course, the Senators stand by what the Senate does; but if we can not get the House to yield, what are we to do? We have done the best we could, Mr. President; and I am going to vote to sustain the action of the conference committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I call for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, a little while ago the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] stated in effect that the House had thoroughly investigated the necessity of continuing this appropriation for another year; and the distinguished Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] now corroborates what the Senator from Washington said.

Let me invite the attention of the Senate to all the evidence that I have, on the spur of the moment, been able to find in the voluminous record of the House hearings on the bill touching this particular item.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is the Senator reading from the House hearings or the Senate hearings?

Mr. NEELY. I am about to read from the record of the hearings before the subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations. The statement of Mr. Galloway, an Assistant Attorney General, is as follows:

WAR CONTRACT CASES

Another very large group of cases, both in number of cases and amount involved, are the war contract cases. Those, as the committee will well understand from their very name, are cases of contracts with the Government for war supplies and war materials. Included in those cases are requisitions by the Government of materials during the war for the purposes of the war.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?
Mr. NEELY. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator is reading from the testimony of Mr. Galloway, the Assistant Attorney General. If he will turn to the testimony of Mr. Michael and Mr. Andrews and others he will find that there are 10 or 15 pages of testimony there.

Mr. NEELY. I do not find their testimony in this volume.

Mr. OVERMAN. It was down before the Senate committee.

Mr. NEELY (reading)—

We have a large number of those, and they are very important. The facts in each case differ from the facts in every other case, requiring separate and individual attention for each case. They can not be treated as a class, except as the principle of the law involved may be the same.

Mr. OLIVER. That class of cases is not being handled by the war board section?

Mr. GALLOWAY. If it is a claim against the Government, the division with which I am connected has charge of it and defends it alone.

Mr. OLIVER. Have any of those cases been decided?

Mr. GALLOWAY. Yes, sir; a number of them. Under the Dent Act, in the event that the War Department refused to make an award, or in the event that the award which was made was unsatisfactory to the claimant, the statute, it is contended, gives the claimant a right of action, and there have been a number of those suits brought.

I might say, however, that in my opinion the war claims are very rapidly passing, and that within a fairly short time—I would not say how soon—we will have them pretty well cleaned up. It will take some little time, however.

I think I have finished outlining these various groups of cases. I am ready to take up the other items.

That is all that I have found in this volume on the question.

Mr. President, if the foregoing constitutes all the evidence on the point in issue, I submit that the Senate conferees were not justified in agreeing to the restoration of this $300,000 item to pay the salaries of 27 private attorneys and their clerical help for another year.

I hope that the conference report will be rejected and that this item may be eliminated. To reappropriate $300,000 for these 27 lawyers who are doing work, if any, that ought to be done by the Attorney General's regular corps of assistants is to throw away more than a quarter of a million dollars of the taxpayers' money.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the Senator says he does not find anything about this matter in the report. I have before me the same report that he has, and if he will turn to page 157 of the report he will find about 10 or 15 pages in regard to this matter.

Mr. NEELY. If there is anything to be said or found in justification of this appropriation I shall be glad to hear it or see it.

Mr. OVERMAN. It begins on page 157.

Mr. NEELY. We were assured a year ago when this matter was debated at great length that unless great progress was made during the ensuing year no further appropriation would be asked for the continuance of the so-called war-fraud prosecutions. Now, without any showing of satisfactory results of the million-dollar appropriation of a year ago, we are asked to make a present of $300,000 more to the 27 lawyers and their assistants, who are to continue a work that promises little or no return for this huge expenditure of public funds.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, will the Senator yield just a moment?

Mr. NEELY. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The testimony with regard to that matter begins at page 157. I see that it goes on to 199, and I have not gotten to the end of the testimony yet with reference to this very matter.

Mr. McKELLAR. Most of that is a list of lawyers, is it not?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, no.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I have not surrendered the floor. I ask the Senator from Washington if Mr. Michael, who appears to have testified relative to this matter, is one of the beneficiaries of the appropriation?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Michael is one of the two men at the head of this section. I do not know whether he is the gentleman to whom the Senator from North Carolina referred or not.

Mr. OVERMAN. He resigned.

Mr. JONES of Washington. But I do know Mr. Michael did not seek the position. It sought him. That is, the head of the department sought him, and Mr. Michael told us in the hearing a year ago that he wanted to get away as soon as possible. If he has not resigned already, he expects to go very soon. He is not here for the money there is in it. The committee will bear me out, and I think the Senator from Tennessee will bear me out, that Mr. Michael and the other gentleman, I believe, Mr. Andrews, impressed the committee as being very able men, men who were trying to do their best, and I think men who had not sought the positions, but were really serving from a patriotic motive, rather than a purely financial motive.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator will recall that the war-frauds section had been entirely changed, and these two gentlemen requested to take charge of it, which they did jointly. They impressed me as being very honorable men, and I am not surprised that they have since resigned, when they found that they were accomplishing nothing for the Government. It is perfectly natural for a self-respecting lawyer, when he finds that it is impossible for him to do anything for his client, to retire from his employment.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NEELY. I yield.

Mr. BRUCE. I would like to ask the Senator from Washington whether the committee united in the vote eliminating this appropriation from the bill when the bill was in committee?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It was not eliminated in the committee; it was eliminated on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. BRUCE. Did the Senator vote adversely to it or in favor of it?

Mr. JONES of Washington. There was no vote.

Mr. McKELLAR. After an argument it was eliminated practically by unanimous consent.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, we are about to do in this case just what we do in every similar case, and that is to make a rubber stamp of the Senate to be used by the managers of the conference on the part of the House. I am tired of the custom and purpose to do everything in my power to discontinue it. We appoint the ablest men in the Senate to manage a conference relative to a revenue or an appropriation bill. These Members are always ready to assert themselves, vigorously defend their opinions, and ably represent their constituents on every other conceivable occasion or question, but just as soon as they get into a controversy with House conferees they become panic-stricken, hoist a white flag, and surrender everything the Senate has intrusted to them. Let it be understood that I am referring to conferees of the Senate in general, and not particularly to the managers who have handled this case.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President—

Mr. NEELY. Recently when the conference report on the revenue bill was being considered and a protest was made against a surrender by our managers the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot] informed us that "the House will never yield."

Mr. President, the Senate's habitual servility to the House in matters of conference is making a unicameral body of the Congress and robbing the Members of this Chamber not only of their self-respect but of the respect of the country. The time is ripe for a declaration of independence by the Senate on the subject of conference committees, their actions and reports. For one, I am ready to sign such a declaration to-day.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NEELY. I yield.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator said he could not find anything in the hearings about the matter, and I knew he had not looked through them. He is mistaken, of course honestly so. I find here a list of the cases and full details of every case now pending, as to every suit that has been brought, and the amounts. The total is $77,041,578. In one case in Maryland $7,000,000 was involved. If Senators will look over these cases, they will find a great many of them in their own States where the Government is suing.

Mr. NEELY. Yes; I recently heard of one of these cases that was settled for $500,000, although it was reported to me that the Government should have recovered $3,000,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. That might be so. It is a good thing that this administration recovered $500,000.

Mr. NEELY. Of course, we should be thankful if we escape from this administration, like Job, with the skin of our teeth.

Mr. OVERMAN. Cases involving $77,000,000 are now pending, which this bureau has in hand, and this man at the head of it is one of the best of Democrats, everybody knows, and one of the best men in Washington to-day. He was brought here.

He did not come; he did not seek the place; and he tells me it is absolutely necessary to wind this up in six months. Then the section is to go out of existence, and there will be no more money appropriated for that purpose. Why not let them have six months more to wind this up?

Mr. NEELY. Because they will not wind it up, either in six months or in six years.

This war-fraud section is about to become a perpetual incubus on the taxpayers. It is the duty of the Senate to discontinue it, and let the regular staff of the Department of Justice complete the work that has been assigned to the special attorneys for whom this $300,000 appropriation is requested. We ought to begin here and now to rid the Government of its countless supernumerary employees, employees who have multiplied in every department of the public service, municipal, State, and national, until they are devouring the substance of the people, as the locusts devastated the land of Egypt in the days of Pharaoh the King.

Instead of preaching economy eternally let us practice it, occasionally, and let us begin now by striking out this item and saving the people $300,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. McKELLAR. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

TEXTILE STRIKE AT PASSAIC, N. J.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, a few days ago a resolution was introduced and referred to the Committee on Manufactures relative to the investigation of the conditions in the strike at Passaic, N. J. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] stated at the time that the employers were quite as much interested in having the resolution agreed to as were the workmen. I have no doubt that the information as stated to the Senate by the Senator was correct information given to him. But it now appears that the employers are no longer desirous of having the resolution passed; at least I have information to that effect. I think it is reliable information.

The conditions in New Jersey are such, or, at least, they are becoming such, that it seems to me there is every reason why the resolution should be passed. I desire to say at this time that unless the committee can see its way clear to make a report upon the resolution within a very short time I shall feel under the necessity of bringing it up for consideration in the Senate with a view to asking the discharge of the committee.

I ask permission to have inserted in the Record, without reading, the telegram which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The telegram is as follows:

NEW YORK, N. Y., April 16, 1926.

United States Senator WILLIAM E. BORAH,
United States Senate Building, Washington, D. C.:

How much longer is the Congress of the United States to ignore the critical situation flaring up in New Jersey textile-strike area? Freedom of speech, press, and assemblage throttled. Reporters thrown out of courts for taking notes. Riot guns and machine guns ready to be trained on women and children. Strike leaders arrested and held incommunicado under $10,000 to $30,000 bail on technical charges.

Women social workers flung into gutter by special armed deputies. Mayor Burke, of Garfield, employee of Botany Worsted Mills, has turned whole situation over to sheriff, who is trying to break backbone of strike regardless of Constitution. Are we to have another Herrin in the East? Why should New Jersey delegation hold up congressional investigation? In name of humanity, can not some action be taken to uphold constitutional guaranty and avert calamity?

E. H. GAUVREAU,
Managing Editor New York Evening Graphic.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the calendar under Rule VIII.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the calendar under Rule VIII. Is there objection?

Mr. BRUCE. What is to be done about the public buildings bill?

Mr. SMOOT. It is on the calendar.

Mr. HARRISON. How far down on the calendar is the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. It is not very far down. It is No. 30 on the calendar.

Mr. HARRISON. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is no Senator ready to speak on the Italian debt settlement, and as we have an hour fixed at which we will vote upon that question, if the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] wants to proceed with the public buildings bill or with any other legislation, and it requires a motion to do so, which would displace the unfinished business, I have no objection to that course being pursued. But I want to say to the Senator that if his bill or any other measure is before the Senate whenever a Senator desires to speak upon the Italian debt settlement, I shall ask that the Italian debt settlement bill be laid before the Senate.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, I regret to be obliged to make a motion to take up House bill 6559, the public buildings bill. I first ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill, and if there shall be objection, I will then make the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maine?

Mr. HARRISON. I object.

Mr. FERNALD. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the public buildings bill.

Mr. HARRISON. That motion is debatable, is it not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is debatable.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I understand if the motion of the Senator from Maine prevails it displaces or sets aside the Italian debt settlement bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has that effect.

Mr. HARRISON. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I submit a parliamentary inquiry first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CURTIS. While it is true that agreeing to the motion made by the Senator from Maine would set aside the Italian debt settlement bill as the unfinished business, yet it would not affect the unanimous-consent agreement to vote upon that bill on next Wednesday?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The effect of the motion, if agreed to, would be to displace the Italian debt-settlement measure as the unfinished business before the Senate, but it would vitiate in no sense the unanimous-consent agreement already entered into for voting on that measure next Wednesday. The absence of a quorum having been suggested, the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fernald	McKellar	Shipstead

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the motion proposed by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD]. On that the yeas and nays have been demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. I am advised that if he were present he would vote as I shall vote. I therefore vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. PHIPPS. I desire to state that my colleague, the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. MEANS], is necessarily absent on account of illness.

Mr. GILLET. I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to my colleague, the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER], and vote "yea."

Mr. BRATTON. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON]. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SIMMONS (after having voted in the negative). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRIS]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to announce the general pair of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. STECK].

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to announce the necessary absence from the Senate on official business of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL].

So Mr. FERNALD's motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6559) to provide for the construction of certain public buildings, and for other purposes.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, there is a very much overworked phrase often used and often untruthfully used, but in this particular instance it may be used with absolute truth, and that is "Everybody knows." Everybody in the Senate, everybody outside the Senate, everybody in the country knows that we need public buildings for the Government. There has been no public buildings bill for 13 years. In that time the business of the Government, as carried on by the different departments of the Government, has increased 100 per cent in the city of Washington, and the public business carried on through the Post Office Department of the country has increased more than 100 per cent. I do not intend to consume all the time this afternoon in explaining the provisions of the pending bill. I desire to say, however, that if we continue much longer under the present system of renting buildings in this city and outside of this city the realtors will own the entire country. In every instance when a lease expires in this city the rent is advanced by 10 to 50 and sometimes 100 per cent. We are paying in this city to-day rentals of more than a million dollars to the realtors, and in the United States at large, mostly for post-office buildings, we are paying $23,000,000, which is more than the yearly appropriation provided by the pending bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Willis in the chair). Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. FERNALD. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Maine states that what we are now paying in rentals amounts annually to more than the actual sum that will be expended under this bill should it become a law?

Mr. FERNALD. Not more, but about the same.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then, I wish to ask the Senator, why does not the bill provide for a larger expenditure under those conditions?

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, I should have liked to have it much larger; but the Senator knows that there are three departments of this Government, and we were unable to get together on any larger annual appropriation.

Mr. SIMMONS. When the Senator refers to the inability of his committee to win the approval of the executive department, I suppose he refers to the economy program. Does the Senator see any economy in that?

Mr. FERNALD. We have our personal views on that matter, Mr. President. I have thought that we ought to expend rather more, but this was all that we could get together on and agree to.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator says, "This was all we could get together on." Who objected? Did the House object? Where did the objection come from?

Mr. FERNALD. The committees of the two Houses, in meeting and conferring on this matter, found that they could agree on this amount. I am not able to say that we might not have gone a little higher, but it is about all that the President cared to stand for.

Mr. REED of Missouri. How much?

Mr. FERNALD. Twenty-five million dollars a year for six years.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. FERNALD. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not want to interrupt if the Senator has a speech outlined and would rather continue without interruption.

Mr. FERNALD. Oh, no; I am perfectly willing to answer questions.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator said, as I understood him, that this amount was all that the President would stand for.

Mr. FERNALD. That is about what he thought we ought to have.

Mr. HARRISON. Is this method of spending the money that will be appropriated under this authorization the only method that the President would stand for?

Mr. FERNALD. I did not discuss that matter with the President. I have not discussed it at all with him, but I have discussed it with the chairman of the House committee.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator tell the Senate why the long-established precedent and practice of Congress of following the course of specifying what places needed post offices and public buildings should be abrogated and we should just say to the Secretary of the Treasury, "Here is so much money; go to it. The election is coming on. Select those places that you, in your wisdom, want to select"?

Mr. FERNALD. If the Senator will just be patient, I had intended to take that up a little later on.

Mr. HARRISON. I am sorry that the question is such a hard one that the Senator does not care to answer it at this time.

Mr. FERNALD. It is not a hard question at all. I am quite willing to answer it right now.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. FERNALD. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESS. I remember that the last public buildings bill that was acted upon was passed in 1913. That was the year in which President Wilson was inaugurated.

Mr. FERNALD. Yes.

Mr. FESS. We had eight years in which there was no public buildings bill passed by either House or Senate, and we have had nearly eight years since, and no public buildings bill. It is not a political question at all. I am wondering whether there is any chance to have any kind of a bill passed unless we remove the objections that heretofore have defeated all legislation; and is not this an effort to remove the objections?

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, there are two answers that I want to make to the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. Before the Senator makes those two answers, may I ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine further yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. FERNALD. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Ohio says that it would be difficult to pass a bill in any other way. Does not the Senator from Maine know as well as the Senator from Ohio knows that public buildings bills always got more votes than any other bills that were proposed in Congress and that that is one of the objections raised to the proposition?

Mr. FESS. They have not gotten any votes for 13 years.

Mr. FERNALD. The Senator asks a very pertinent question. There are two very good answers to it.

First of all, the reason why we could not pass one of the old-style bills is the fact that there were more than a thousand bills introduced providing for public buildings in the different States. It is simply impossible for a committee to consider as many bills as that and do justice to anybody. That is the first answer.

The second answer, which is rather of a political nature, is this—and the Senator knows that I have never undertaken to bring politics into any discussion on this floor. I came here as a business man to do what seemed to me to be the right thing, regardless of politics; but, inasmuch as the Senator has mentioned the matter, as I go on and explain this bill let me say to the Senator that the first provision of $15,000,000 is carrying out precisely the plan that was inaugurated under a Democratic administration by a Democratic President and a Democratic Secretary of the Treasury. Sixty-five buildings will be built under that plan; so it can not be charged that we are using politics in this particular bill.

Now I want to go on and explain the provisions of the bill.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me there while I illustrate?

Mr. FERNALD. Yes.

Mr. ASHURST. Take, for example, the State of Arizona. Three buildings in that State were authorized in the public buildings bill of 1913. This bill simply furnishes the money to build the three buildings in the State of Arizona that were authorized in 1913.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. FERNALD. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Referring to the statement just made by the Senator from Arizona, as well as that of the Senator from Maine, I desire to call attention to an amendment which was put into this bill on page 2, lines 7 to 9, inclusive. If in the act of 1913, the last general bill, provision was made only for acquiring a site, this bill does not insure the erection of any building upon that site unless the Secretary of the Treasury in his discretion shall see fit to construct a building upon that site. I am not sure but that the same provision relates to section 4 of the bill, where sites only have been acquired; and I feel sure from what has been said by the Senator from Maine as well as the Senator from Arizona that it was not the intention to put in jeopardy those places where sites were authorized and the construction of buildings authorized.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. FERNALD. I will yield to the Senator from Virginia in just a moment.

In reply to the Senator from New Mexico, I want to say that all of the buildings that were authorized under the act of 1913 are provided for and will be built under this bill. As to the second question there are a great many sites that were mentioned where it is not necessary and it is not asked now that buildings be built. They are not emergency matters, and in those instances it was thought best to give preference, and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] has offered an amendment covering that particular matter.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield now?

Mr. FERNALD. Yes.

Mr. SWANSON. I thought that we certainly ought to construct the buildings that have been authorized. This bill directs that to be done. The money is appropriated. Then there are other places where sites have been bought and no buildings have been authorized. I thought those ought to have preference over anything else contained in the bill, and the bill was drawn in that way. It was afterwards developed that some of these places where sites had been authorized were mining places with shifting populations. I was talking a few minutes ago to a Senator who has in his State some places where they had oil wells and mines where he would not ask for public buildings. As drawn the bill would compel the construction of buildings at those places if they have been heretofore authorized. This provision was put in so as not to make it mandatory on the Secretary of the Treasury to construct a building in a town that had 5,000 people in 1913 and has not 500 now. It leaves it to him, so that where the necessity for buildings has disappeared their construction would not be compulsory.

If this language does not cover that view of the matter, I am sure the Senator from Maine will accept any amendment that will carry out that purpose—first, to make it compulsory to construct a building where a building was authorized; second, to give preference where the site has been acquired under the act of 1913. If this language does not do that, and the Senator wants to propose any reservations to make it certain, he can draw any language that will do that and yet will not compel the construction of buildings where the town has practically disappeared.

In order that Senators may know what they are doing, I should like to have read from the desk the list of buildings in the different States that will be constructed under this $15,000,000 provision, and then what will be done under the authorization for sites, so that every Senator may know exactly what his State gets under this bill, and nobody will have any doubt about it.

Mr. SMOOT. In other words, if the Senator will read section 3 of the bill—

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I have that in mind, and I am trying to get an interpretation of this amendment put into the bill so far as it relates to section 3 of the bill. As stated by the Senator from Virginia, I believe that he has clearly in mind doing the same thing that I believe should be done; but I call attention to the language of this amendment on page 2, which says:

Giving preference, where he considers conditions justify such action, to cases where sites for public buildings have heretofore been acquired or authorized to be acquired.

I think it is quite clear that in cases coming within the purview of that amendment it is wholly within the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury as to whether or not he shall construct a building there. In cases where an authorization was made for the acquirement of a site and the construction of a building, if the site has been acquired, would not that put such a case under this amendment rather than under section 3 of the bill, which makes provision for completing such buildings?

As I take it, in any case if a site only has been acquired, even though there may have been an appropriation for acquiring the site and the construction of a building, it would still be within the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury as to whether or not the building should be constructed. If that is the purpose of this bill, I am quite sure that so far as I am concerned I could not agree to it.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that if he will note the enumerations found in section 3, and will get the documents referred to there—

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I have that document right before me.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, if the Senator has all of those documents, he will find that the case he has just referred to is covered in section 3; and all cases that are covered in section 3 do not fall under the provisions of the proposed amendment on page 2 that the Senator has just referred to.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. If the Senator from Utah is right about that, then the matter which I am bringing to the attention of the Senate is settled; but I am not convinced that he is right about it.

Mr. SWANSON. I am satisfied that the Senator from Maine will accept any provision that gives preference in the expenditure of this money to places where sites have been acquired, provided we do not compel the construction of buildings in places like mining camps where a site has been acquired and the population has disappeared.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. There is nothing said here about the disappearance of populations.

Mr. SWANSON. I know there is nothing said about it, but that amendment was drawn in its present form because we did not know the specific cases. The Senator might have an amendment drawn providing that where the receipts of the post office do not amount to so much we will get rid of the sites; but, as far as I am concerned—and I hope the Senator from Maine will feel the same way—the Senator can draw any amendment that will suit him that will give preference to those places, provided it does not compel the construction of buildings where they are not needed.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine has the floor. To whom does he yield?

Mr. FERNALD. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH. I want to ask that we may have read the list of sites and buildings that have been authorized. Let us know by States just what is proposed under this bill.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Before the reading begins, I should like to make an inquiry. Does the document from which the Senator will read indicate the cases where an authorization was made for the purpose of acquiring a site and the construction of a building as distinguished from those cases where sites only were authorized to be acquired?

Mr. FERNALD. It does. Two or three buildings were left out of Document 28 by some clerical error, which have been added to the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the bill name any towns or cities which have public buildings in them?

Mr. FERNALD. Only those that were authorized under the act of 1913.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand. Then all Senators are talking about now are these sites which have been purchased and where no buildings have been authorized. The $15,000,000 can be used for that purpose, but the $100,000,000 has nothing to do with that at all.

Mr. FERNALD. Not at all. If the Senator will permit me to explain the three different provisions of the bill, I think it might be helpful in solving this problem.

Mr. SMITH. My request was that the amounts authorized to be expended in the different States might be read, so that we would know what provision was made.

Mr. FERNALD. For buildings already authorized.

Mr. ASHURST. And sites.

Mr. SMITH. Buildings and sites already authorized, so that we may know what States are going to get preferential treatment under the $15,000,000 appropriation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair suggests that the Senator from South Carolina should be more specific in his request, because there is no way the clerk can tell what is to be read in the table that has been sent to the desk.

Mr. SMITH. I was informed by a member of the committee that that was the correct table, giving an answer to the request I made.

Mr. FERNALD. If the Senator from South Carolina will give me his attention, since that document was gotten out 62 buildings have been erected, in the last two years.

Mr. SMITH. This will give us a pretty good idea.

Mr. FERNALD. It will give an idea.

Mr. McKELLAR. Instead of giving a good idea, can not the Senator from Maine give us an exact list of those that are on the preferential list?

Mr. FERNALD. I can give a list of those that have been authorized to date.

Mr. SMITH. Then, in place of the clerk reading it, let the chairman of the committee read it himself.

Mr. HARRISON. May I inquire, is this authorized for buildings or is it merely for sites?

Mr. SMITH. For sites.

Mr. FERNALD. For buildings—

Mr. HARRISON. I want to know. One talks one way and another another.

Mr. FERNALD. These are buildings authorized in the bill which will be built.

Mr. HARRISON. And the money for those buildings only is to come out of the $15,000,000?

Mr. FERNALD. Absolutely.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let us have the list read.

Mr. HARRISON. And any site that has been authorized does not come out of this $15,000,000?

Mr. FERNALD. No. The list is as follows:

Alaska, Juneau.

Arizona, Globe.

Arkansas, Prescott.

California, Red Bluff, San Pedro.

Colorado, Durango.

Connecticut, Branford, Putnam.

Florida, Marianna.

Georgia, West Point.

Idaho, Coeur d'Alene, Sandpoint.

Illinois, Batavia, Metropolis, Mount Carmel, Paxton.

Iowa, Des Moines.

Kentucky, Shelbyville.

Maine, Caribou, Fort Fairfield.

Massachusetts, Leominster, Malden, Newburyport, Southbridge, Waltham, Winchester.

Michigan, Wyandotte.

Minnesota, Montevideo.

Nebraska, Central City.

Nevada, Fallon, Goldfield.

New Jersey, Bayonne, East Orange, Millville, Montclair.

New Mexico, East Las Vegas.
New York, Fort Plain, Long Island City, Syracuse, Yonkers.
North Carolina, Wilson.
North Dakota, Jamestown.
Ohio, Akron, Fremont, Wilmington.
Pennsylvania, Donora, Lewistown, McKees Rocks, Olyphant, Sayre, Tamaqua, Tarentum, Waynesburg.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator read the Pennsylvania list and also the Mississippi list?

Mr. FERNALD. There are no authorizations for Mississippi.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. FERNALD. Let me complete the reading, and then I will yield.

Mr. BRUCE. I was just going to ask the Senator, in connection with that, whether there is any provision made there for the State of Maryland.

Mr. FERNALD. South Carolina, Lancaster.

South Dakota, Chamberlain.

Tennessee, Athens.

Washington, Seattle.

West Virginia, Williamson.

Wisconsin, Madison, Tomah.

Wyoming, Buffalo, Cody.

Totals for these projects will be $17,000,000, and it will require $9,100,000.

Additional:

Missouri, St. Louis.

New Jersey, Newark.

Montana, Missoula.

Mr. SWANSON. That is under what section?

Mr. FERNALD. That is under the $15,000,000 section. All of those have been provided for under the act of 1913. We are just carrying out the provisions of that act.

Mr. SMOOT. I was quite sure there would be a misunderstanding owing to what the Senator said in the first place. These are the building projects contained in Senate Document 28, reestimated; not all the buildings in Document No. 28, but these are the ones being reestimated.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Reestimated when?

Mr. SMOOT. Since Document No. 28 was prepared.

Mr. FERNALD. That was two years ago.

Mr. SMOOT. Two years ago.

Mr. FERNALD. And there have been 62 buildings built since that time.

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand that if this $15,000,000 bill passes, the only building that will be erected in Tennessee will be the one at Athens.

Mr. FERNALD. The Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. McKELLAR. I would be glad to be informed about it.

Mr. FERNALD. The Senator's State is just as likely to have public buildings erected in it as any other State.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is if we take our hats in our hands and go up and ask the Secretary of the Treasury if he will do it.

Mr. FERNALD. I do not think that is quite fair. It is left to the discretion of the Postmaster General for emergency cases. If there is an emergency in the Senator's State—and I think there is one—if there is an emergency case where a post office is needed, the Postmaster General will know better than anyone else about the matter.

Mr. McKELLAR. Not long ago I undertook for two hours to get the Architect of the Treasury, who has this matter in charge for the Secretary, to state whether or not he regarded a case as an emergency, and he declined to do it. I do not feel that there is very much chance for Tennessee under the terms of the bill.

Mr. FERNALD. Would the Senator say that the Secretary of the Treasury was fair if he should promise all Senators who went to him that they would have public buildings erected in their States? Suppose a dozen Senators should go?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know what goes on.

Mr. FERNALD. I can tell the Senator—

Mr. McKELLAR. I saw the Architect of the Treasury at the suggestion of the Senator from Maine. Upon his suggestion I had a conference with him for about two hours, and I got no satisfaction out of him whatsoever.

Mr. FERNALD. The Senator got just what any other Senator got.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then that is precious little.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I would like to inquire of the Senator from Maine from what he was reading just a while ago?

Mr. FERNALD. I was reading the reestimates of the cost of buildings that were provided for under the act of 1913. All of those will be built if the pending bill passes.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I do not find any such provision in the bill. Document No. 28, referred to in the bill, contains a very much larger list than that read by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. FERNALD. I have just explained that 62 buildings indicated on that list have been built since that document was printed.

Mr. SMOOT. Not only that but it includes buildings as to which there was no need of a reestimate. The list the Senator read was of reestimates, and in Document No. 28, I will say to the Senator from Tennessee, there are mentioned seven buildings for Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. And all those have been built.

Mr. SMOOT. Therefore Tennessee is away ahead of the States that are not mentioned in Document No. 28.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; we are away behind. Other States have had theirs first.

Mr. SMOOT. If these are all built but one, Tennessee is better off than any State mentioned in Document No. 28.

Mr. SWANSON. I would like to have that document read which shows the buildings that were provided for in 1913. Those that have not been built under that will be built under this provision.

Mr. SMOOT. They are set out here.

Mr. SWANSON. All those buildings have already been built. The Senator does not want to have them rebuilt?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly not.

Mr. SWANSON. I want to say that in 1913, under a fair division of the fund for public buildings, certain buildings were authorized.

Mr. SMOOT. Here is the list of them.

Mr. SWANSON. Those in whose States buildings have been erected have no right to complain. I would like to have that list read to the Senate to show that the Senator from Tennessee and the Members of the House agreed to the arrangement made at that time, and all that would be done under section 1 would be to complete what was authorized at that time.

Mr. FERNALD. That is all there is to it.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Tennessee that although Utah is mentioned in Document No. 28, we have not all the buildings, but Tennessee has, and Tennessee has no right to complain.

Mr. McKELLAR. These buildings were built years before, and the sum authorized in 1913 was to complete the number of buildings that had been started before. Tennessee has not gotten her proportion, even under the old law, and under this law Congress is going to appropriate $100,000,000 to be turned over to the Secretary of the Treasury to fix the places and the amount to be expended on each one just as he sees fit.

Mr. SWANSON. We will discuss that when we get to it.

Mr. McKELLAR. We are at it right now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine has the floor. To whom does he yield?

Mr. FERNALD. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON. The object now is to determine whether that $15,000,000 is right. The Senator from Tennessee has his part of it, and he is kicking because he has his completed before other States have theirs.

Mr. McKELLAR. Quite the contrary—

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, I can not yield further. I want to explain this measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. FERNALD. I know the Senator from Tennessee means to be fair. The Senator from Virginia has explained the matter absolutely. In 1913, when that bill was passed, different buildings were to be built in Tennessee. They have all been built since that time but one. There is no question about it, and, as the Senator from Virginia said, we are working on this $15,000,000 project. I want to explain that before we get to the $100,000,000 proposition.

Mr. McKELLAR. The $15,000,000 project, of course, is perfectly proper. There is no objection to that. I do not think there will be any objection on the part of anybody, because the buildings have to be completed. But when it comes to appropriating $100,000,000 to be turned over to the Secretary of the Treasury, to be distributed under his will, I am opposed to it.

Mr. FERNALD. I understand; but we have not gotten to that yet. The Senator is perfectly satisfied with the $15,000,000 provision?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am satisfied with the $15,000,000 as provided here.

Mr. FERNALD. Let me go on with something else.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I now ask that Document No. 28, covering the buildings provided for in that document, be read to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Utah? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will read the document referred to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, as I understand it, the list that is to be read now from the desk is a list of the buildings that are to be completed under this bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Those that are already completed, of course, are not provided for here.

Mr. McKELLAR. Those that are not—

Mr. SMOOT. Will be completed under this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read as requested. The legislative clerk read as follows:

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. FERNALD. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. May I ask the Senator from Maine what post-office buildings are to be erected in the State of New York?

Mr. FERNALD. Under the first provision of the bill they are at Fort Plain, Long Island City, Syracuse, and Yonkers.

Mr. COPELAND. How much is the appropriation for Fort Plain?

Mr. FERNALD. Fort Plain is estimated to cost $75,000, and there has been $65,000 already appropriated. It will require $10,000.

Mr. COPELAND. Of course, I am delighted that Fort Plain is to have a post-office building, but does it not seem amazing to the Senator from Maine that Fort Plain, with a population less than 3,000, should have a total appropriation of $75,000?

Mr. FERNALD. That provision was enacted in 1913, and I assume the Senator must have had a very influential Representative from that district or Senator from his State at that time. Under the old method that was the way those things were obtained.

Mr. COPELAND. I am delighted that some active Congressman was so energetic as to get $75,000 for this nice little town. I am delighted that they are to have a post office, but I want to inquire why the Bronx, with a million people, is not taken care of? Why is not Nyack taken care of, and Suffern and Tarrytown and Monticello and Hudson, as well as a hundred other New York State towns I might mention?

Mr. FERNALD. That case proves the folly of that kind of legislation and the advantage of this kind. There were many such instances all over the country under the old system.

Mr. COPELAND. What is the advantage of the new plan?

Mr. FERNALD. There will be no more of those buildings erected where they are not needed under the provisions of the present bill. They will be built where the emergency exists.

Mr. COPELAND. Is it the contention of the Senator that those post offices, including Fort Plain, are unnecessary? Does the Senator contend that under the old plan the post offices which have been provided for are unnecessary?

Mr. FERNALD. I am taking the Senator's word for it. It seems, in this instance, that it was unnecessary.

Mr. COPELAND. Regardless of what the policy is and who established it, it is perfectly absurd to have such discriminations. Let me repeat that I am glad Fort Plain is to have a post-office building; but there are great thriving commercial communities in New York State where post-office buildings are more sadly needed, as, for instance, in the Bronx. I hope the new plan may permit this. It is a great pity to think the money of the taxpayers may be carelessly appropriated.

Mr. FERNALD. It is a very great waste.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. FERNALD. I yield.

Mr. OVERMAN. I notice that the Senator is now talking about $100,000,000.

Mr. FERNALD. Yes; I am going to get to that amount now.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator has got off of the $15,000,000? Has the Senator a list of the buildings proposed to be built with the $100,000,000?

Mr. FERNALD. No; there is no list.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have been told by a Member of the House of Representatives, though I do not know whether it is true or not, that 22 States, according to the present arrangement, will not get anything even under the $100,000,000 plan. I do not know whether that is correct or not. I am asking the Senator if he knows.

Mr. FERNALD. The Senator has information that I do not have. I am sure he will take my word.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to know if it has ever been estimated for in such a way as to enable the Senator to know?

Mr. FERNALD. There is no such list, and I have never heard of any estimate being made.

Mr. OVERMAN. I take the Senator's word for it, of course. May I ask one further question? Has the Senator a list of the places where there is an emergency?

Mr. FERNALD. No; I have not. There was such a list made up, I think, two years ago. The House asked for a list of emergency cases from the Post Office Department. They estimated in many instances where an emergency did exist, but that list is of no value now, because many of those places have been provided for. It just comes to my mind that there was a case in Minnesota, at St. Paul, where there was an emergency case listed. They have had to rent a building there at an expense of $120,000 a year rental.

Mr. OVERMAN. I admit that is a matter of necessity. A list was furnished to me, and I think it was the emergency list of two years ago to which the Senator referred. My State did not have an emergency case in that list, and yet I know some of the post-office buildings in North Carolina are about to fall down.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator mean the list that was just read at the desk?

Mr. OVERMAN. No; I am asking the Senator from Maine for information, and he tells me that I am wrong. I was inquiring about the emergency cases.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine has the floor. To whom is he yielding?

Mr. OVERMAN. I am asking for information, if the Senator has a list of the emergency buildings, or if he can advise me where it can be found?

Mr. FERNALD. No; I have not.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. FERNALD. I do.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator from Maine a minute ago said that under this plan there would be no such waste of public funds as occurred at Fort Plain. If the Senator does not know where the money is to be expended, what is the basis of that statement?

Mr. FERNALD. A Senator stated that a post-office building had been erected in that town when it was not needed.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; I heard that statement.

Mr. FERNALD. I believe that the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General in using their judgment will never erect a building where it is not needed. I base my judgment on the fact—and I think the Senator from Arkansas must concur with me in the statement—I have lived and acted under a Democratic administration—

Mr. CARAWAY. I knew that some good influence had come into the Senator's life at one time.

Mr. FERNALD. Just a moment. I lived under two Democratic Secretaries of the Treasury. I found them just as fair and just as honorable and as desirous of doing the right thing as I have found to be the case with our present Secretary of the Treasury, whom I have seen but once. I believe in leaving such matters to public officers where they are disposed to be fair. I know and the Senator from Arkansas knows that Senators and Representatives in years past have secured the passage of public building bills by locking them together and helping each other, and in many towns all over the country buildings have been erected where they were not needed.

Mr. CARAWAY. That, however, did not happen in my State. But I was going to ask the Senator, is he under the impression that the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General know more about Maine than the Senator from Maine knows?

Mr. FERNALD. I am satisfied that the Postmaster General knows more about the post offices in Maine than I do. He knows about the receipts of the offices there.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator himself can get the receipts of post offices in three minutes. If that is what the Senator would be governed by, that information could be had in a minute. Does the Senator imagine that the Postmaster General and the Secretary of the Treasury know more about the development of communities and the possible future needs of every State in the Union than do all the men in both branches of Congress?

Mr. FERNALD. The Senator from Maine knows that the Postmaster General can tell him in three seconds about every post office in the United States, while I do not have that information.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Postmaster General can not tell—

Mr. FERNALD. Will the Senator allow me to conclude my sentence?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. FERNALD. I do not know anything about the post offices of the Senator's State, while the Postmaster General does know about them. He also knows about my State; he knows about all the States.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Postmaster General knows about the postal receipts, but that information is not confined to the Postmaster General. Any of us may also have that information. The question I am asking is, is it the impression of the Senator from Maine that the Postmaster General knows more about the possible development and, therefore, the future needs in all the States than do all the Representatives and Senators?

Mr. FERNALD. I am inclined to think the Postmaster General knows more about my State than I do, for I know very little about the post offices in the State.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator knows something about the post offices in a general way. He knows the State is up north somewhere.

Mr. FERNALD. I know where the towns are.

Mr. CARAWAY. And the Postmaster General knows what the receipts of the post offices are.

Mr. FERNALD. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. And the Senator from Maine could get that information in a few minutes?

Mr. FERNALD. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. Is that the basis on which the Senator now urges us to surrender all control over the appropriations for public buildings?

Mr. FERNALD. I am going to discuss the matter of giving up control over the appropriations later on, when we get to it.

Mr. BRUCE and Mr. SHORTRIDGE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield, and, if so, to whom?

Mr. FERNALD. I yield first to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. BRUCE. I will ask the Senator to pause long enough in order to allow me to offer an amendment to the bill, to be considered in due course when reached.

Mr. FERNALD. Does the Senator from Maryland desire that the amendment which he proposes shall be taken up after the committee amendments shall have been disposed of?

Mr. BRUCE. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maryland wish to have his amendment read?

Mr. BRUCE. I should like to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment, following which the amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 23, after the word "conveyance," insert a colon and the following proviso:

Provided, however, That with the exception of land that may be taken for increasing the site of the Government Printing Office no additional land shall be acquired in the District of Columbia north of Pennsylvania Avenue or north of New York Avenue.

Mr. FERNALD. I assume that the amendment will lie on the table, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order has been made.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. FERNALD. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The Secretary has just read a long list of cities where post-office buildings are to be erected. For the information of the Senate, I wish the Senator from Maine would now explain from what fund the money is to come for the purpose of carrying out the work of building the post offices named? I wish the Senator would explain so that I, at least, may understand it.

Mr. FERNALD. There is, I will say to the Senator from California, an appropriation in the bill of $15,000,000, and all of the post offices that have been authorized under the act of 1913 will be built out of that $15,000,000, to be added to what is already appropriated for that purpose. That covers the $15,000,000. If we are all satisfied with this provision—and I think we must be—

Mr. SMITH and Mr. McKELLAR addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. FERNALD. I yield first to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH. Before the Senator leaves the discussion of section 3 of the bill, let me say that, as I understand, it leaves the entire expenditure of all that has heretofore been appropriated, plus the $15,000,000 provided in this bill as the additional limit, entirely to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury as to what buildings shall be completed and as to what buildings additional sums shall be allotted. The bill uses this language:

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to disregard the limit of cost fixed by Congress for each project—

That is those that are already provided for—

to purchase additional land for enlargement of sites and to enter into contracts for all or so many of said buildings heretofore authorized to be constructed, but not yet under contract, as may be possible within a total additional limit of cost of $15,000,000.

He could put the whole amount into a half dozen buildings if he say fit.

Mr. FERNALD. The Senator is mistaken. Let me say to him that the list which has been read covers all the buildings which were authorized in 1913, and under the provisions of this bill carrying $15,000,000 appropriation every one of those buildings in each of the towns named will be erected.

Mr. SMITH. But the bill does not say so.

Mr. FERNALD. It does say so.

Mr. SMITH. If the Senator will examine the language he will find that the Secretary of the Treasury may increase the limit as to any particular project.

Mr. FERNALD. Let me tell the Senator why that is. The reason why the 65 buildings have not been erected is that there was not sufficient money originally provided with which to erect them. So the authorizations have not been carried out and the buildings provided for have not been erected. This bill, however, provides that within the additional $15,000,000 every one of those buildings may be erected.

Mr. SMITH. The language of the bill in section 3, which provides for the $15,000,000 appropriation, proceeds to enumerate certain acts and certain appropriations in addition to those covered by the statement which was read from the desk, and then it says, without a period in the entire paragraph:

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to disregard—

I am reading beginning at the end of line 11, on page 6—

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to disregard the limit of cost fixed by Congress for each project.

Mr. FERNALD. Now wait a minute right there. The Secretary of the Treasury is to disregard the limit heretofore fixed by Congress. That is the reason why these buildings were not erected. That covers that.

Mr. SMITH. Very well. The section reads further.

to purchase additional land for enlargement of sites and to enter into contracts for all or so many of said buildings heretofore authorized to be constructed, but not yet under contract, as may be possible within a total additional limit of cost of $15,000,000.

Reading the context in the preceding portion of the section he is to disregard the appropriations heretofore authorized, and he is to add to those appropriations amounts to the limit of $15,000,000 and construct and complete such buildings as he sees fit within that limit. If the amount appropriated will provide for the construction of only half of them or a third of them, he may expend it all on that limited number.

Mr. FERNALD. Let me say to the Senator that the estimate for completing those buildings is less than $15,000,000, and everyone of them will be erected. It will cost at present rates $13,700,000 to do so.

Mr. SMITH. It seems to me, Mr. President, that it would have been a very easy matter to have made it mandatory in the law, and provided that the buildings heretofore provided for shall be completed at an additional cost not to exceed $15,000,000. Then there would be no doubt about it; but here it is proposed to provide that the Secretary of the Treasury may increase the limit as to any such building.

Mr. FERNALD. Let me say to the Senator that the limit of cost will have to be increased as to most of the buildings. The reason why they have not already been built is that the amount appropriated was not sufficient.

Mr. SMITH. Very well; but suppose the Secretary of the Treasury were to increase the limit as to some of them only and thus consume the $15,000,000, the other buildings would have to wait.

Mr. FERNALD. I have assurance that that will not be done.

Mr. SMITH. Oh, the Senator has an assurance!

Mr. HARRISON and Mr. ODDIE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. FERNALD. I yield first to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator says that there were 68 of these projects which the $15,000,000 would take care of, as I understood him.

Mr. FERNALD. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. And the designation of those buildings was read from Senate Document No. 28.

Mr. FERNALD. I will say that that is rather confusing.

Mr. HARRISON. That is exactly what I want to have clear in my mind. The Senator read some document which the Senator from Utah said was not correct.

Mr. FERNALD. I have the document here.

Mr. SMOOT. I said that was a reappraisal.

Mr. FERNALD. This document was printed two years ago and a number of the 62 buildings mentioned therein have been erected.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator does not want to give the impression to the Senate that all the projects in the various States mentioned in the document which was read are to be provided for under this $15,000,000 fund?

Mr. FERNALD. No.

Mr. HARRISON. They are merely to be given preference under the sum appropriated?

Mr. FERNALD. Only those that are authorized and have not been built will be erected and not those for which the sites only have been provided.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. FERNALD. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. ODDIE. I have introduced several bills providing for the erection of a number of Federal buildings in the State of Nevada. I should like the Senator from Maine in a few words to tell me what the chances will be for those buildings being taken care of under this bill?

Mr. FERNALD. There are at least 380 bills of similar character before the committee of the Senate. We have not given them any consideration, because we felt that this general bill would cover the whole situation. No attempt has been made to secure action on any of those particular bills. I do not know where the $100,000,000 appropriation is to be expended, but I presume it will be spent where emergencies exist. I can not give the Senator any assurance.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. FERNALD. The Senator may.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why were not the bills which have been introduced covering building projects in various States referred to the Treasury Department for an estimate and for a report so that we would know something about them? Are we going to turn over our legislative duties to the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, we did not believe that it would be the proper procedure to consider ten or eleven hundred special bills.

The committees of the two Houses decided on this method of handling public building measures. So we have not asked for estimates from the department on the individual special bills.

Mr. McKELLAR. But during the entire history of the Government the other course has been pursued.

Mr. FERNALD. Yes; this is the first time we have undertaken to follow this method.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, before the Senator proceeds, will he allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President—

Mr. FERNALD. I first yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. When a public buildings bill was previously under consideration in the Senate, the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] offered an amendment covering those building projects which have already been authorized. That measure could not be finally disposed of, and so no action was taken.

Mr. FERNALD. Absolutely.

Mr. FESS. And this item is intended to cover all the Senator from Florida included in his amendment?

Mr. FERNALD. Absolutely. Now I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, if buildings should be constructed on all the sites that have been designated in legislation by Congress heretofore, and if all the buildings should be completed that have been authorized, according to the estimate of the Treasury Department, what would be the total sum?

Mr. FERNALD. About $38,000,000. The cost under this bill would be about $15,000,000, and to build on the sites the Senator mentions would cost about $23,000,000.

Mr. HARRISON. It would be a total, then, of about $38,000,000?

Mr. FERNALD. About $38,000,000; yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. In that connection, I notice on Document 28:

Tennessee—Elizabethton: (Site.) Not purchased.

That was read by the clerk a few moments ago. The Senator will find it on page 6.

Mr. FERNALD. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will that be included in this bill?

Mr. FERNALD. What is it—just for a site?

Mr. McKELLAR. It says here, referring to the site—Not purchased.

But it has been authorized.

Mr. FERNALD. No; that will not be included in the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Here is Athens, where the site has been purchased but nothing else has been done. Will that be included in this bill?

Mr. FERNALD. It has been authorized; yes. In the case of Athens, Tenn., there has been $95,000 appropriated, and $45,000 will be taken out of this $15,000,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator go down, then, to the Memphis sub post office?

Mr. FERNALD. That is the only one in the Senator's State that will come under that provision.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will that come under that provision to the extent of $630,000?

Mr. FERNALD. Not under this; no. That will have to come under the general provision of $100,000,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why would the Memphis sub post office be taken out of this?

Mr. FERNALD. There is no authorization.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; there is an authorization. If the Senator will examine the document, he will see that there is an authorization of $210,000, and the department has estimated $750,000. It appears there.

Mr. FERNALD. The authorization has not been made.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; the authorization has been made, to the amount stated, $210,000. That appears on page 6 of the document. The department thought, though, that more ought to be spent there, and estimated further that it would cost $750,000, but it has not been reported upon. There is, however, an authorization of $210,000. Why would not that come within the appropriation?

Mr. FERNALD. Memphis has recently had an appropriation for a substation post office. The department has listed Memphis as one of the towns where the necessity is urgent, and it would come under the $100,000,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. But it would not come under this?

Mr. FERNALD. No.

Now, if Senators will allow me to proceed, I think I have fairly cleared up the meaning of the provision carrying the $15,000,000. The next provision in the bill is for $50,000,000, to be expended in the District of Columbia.

Nobody knows so well as the Senators who have been on the Public Buildings Commission the need of buildings in this city. The efficiency that can be brought about by having these clerks and operators in the different departments under one roof will be more than can be estimated in dollars and cents. For instance, the activities of the Agricultural Department are distributed among 45 different buildings. The activities of the Bureau of Internal Revenue and the General Accounting Office are distributed all over the city. If the chief wants to get into communication with any one of his aids, a man must go half or three-quarters of a mile to get to the department. That condition exists in all of the different departments in this city. We are paying $980,000 annually in rentals here, and every time a lease expires the owner of the building raises the rental from 10 to 50 and sometimes 100 per cent.

In the case of the Post Office Department, in one city under the emergency clause that has been reported, we are paying $120,000 rental for a building that we had to get within two years. In the entire Post Office Department we are paying $23,000,000 in rentals, so that the total amount paid for rentals of public buildings by the United States Government to-day is almost $25,000,000.

It is not expected that these can all be cared for under this bill; it is not expected that relief can be given to every one; but we can begin to make improvements and stop some of these tremendous charges.

In 1913 the parcel post bill passed. Last year the department handled 3,780,000,000 packages of parcel post.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, is it intended to build great parcel-post storage houses?

Mr. FERNALD. No.

Mr. OVERMAN. In the case of these rentals that the Senator is talking about, a great deal of the amount is for rent of storage houses, is it not?

Mr. FERNALD. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is it intended to build those storage houses with the $100,000,000?

Mr. FERNALD. I can not tell the Senator just what the intention of the department is.

Mr. OVERMAN. The intention would be to build where they are paying rent, in order to stop paying rent?

Mr. FERNALD. Yes; to stop paying rent.

Mr. OVERMAN. Would not that take nearly $100,000,000, without doing anything else?

Mr. FERNALD. No; I do not think so, Mr. President. I think the department will be inclined to take care of every emergency case and to make this legislation popular.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is the reason why I am asking the question. The Senator says we are paying an immense amount of rent?

Mr. FERNALD. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator calls this an emergency case, and he wants to take care of all those conditions?

Mr. FERNALD. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to know how much money will be required for these emergency cases?

Mr. FERNALD. I am unable to answer that question. I know what the growth of the postal business has been in 13 years. Last year the parcel post carried 3,796,916,179 pounds of matter. In 1923 it carried 3,594,000,000 pounds, in round numbers. In 1913, when it was first established, it carried but 708,000,000 pounds. To show what a tremendous advance there has been in that kind of service, the receipts of the Post Office Department in 1913 were $266,619,000, while in 1925 they were $599,591,000—almost double in 13 years, a gain of $332,000,000 in 13 years—and yet we have not had an appropriation for public buildings in all that time.

Mr. President, I have tried to explain the situation in regard to these three provisions—the first provision to take care of buildings already authorized under the act of 1913; the second provision to use $50,000,000 for the construction of buildings in the District of Columbia; the third provision to carry $100,000,000 for public buildings in different sections of the United States.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator let me ask him a question there?

Mr. FERNALD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. If it was such a wise thing to leave the departments here in charge of determining where these buildings should be erected, why was it necessary to give the District of Columbia specifically $50,000,000?

Mr. FERNALD. That was about the amount estimated by the Public Buildings Commission.

Mr. CARAWAY. I know; but why should it be taken care of up to the full amount of its estimates, and leave all the 48 States to get only what was left, and at such places as the department might see fit to authorize?

Mr. FERNALD. That is the provision of the bill.

Mr. CARAWAY. I know it is, but I am asking for the reason. I can see that it is in the bill.

Mr. FERNALD. I think it is exceedingly necessary to have these public buildings in the city of Washington. I think it is economical to build them.

Mr. CARAWAY. Presumably it is economical, or we would not build them anywhere; but why was it thought necessary to say to the department: "You must expend $50,000,000 of this sum in the District of Columbia, and then you may spend every bit of the rest of it in one other State if you want to"? Under what theory did they do that?

Mr. FERNALD. If the Senator has read the bill—

Mr. CARAWAY. I have.

Mr. FERNALD. Then, as a good lawyer, the Senator certainly will understand from the language of the bill that not more than $5,000,000 can be used in any one State.

Mr. CARAWAY. I do not know where that provision is. The Senator can not point it out.

Mr. OVERMAN. Five million dollars in any one State?

Mr. HARRISON. Five million dollars annually.

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, of course; but the Senator knows that it is not all to be spent in one year. It can be spent where the department pleases; and when the Senator talks about there being a limitation here to the expenditure of $5,000,000 in a State I know that the Senator was just mistaken about it.

Mr. FERNALD. No; I was not mistaken. The Senator from Arkansas was mistaken. He said all of it could be spent in one State.

Mr. CARAWAY. It can be, absolutely. If the Senator does not know any more about his bill than that, he had better read it himself instead of asking me to read it. The Secretary could spend every dollar of it in one State, if he desired.

Mr. FERNALD. How does the Senator come to that conclusion?

Mr. CARAWAY. Because the language of the bill says so. It provides for his expending $5,000,000 a year, and he could take enough years to spend it all in one State.

Mr. FERNALD. But it is to be expended in six years. Twenty-five million dollars a year is to be expended for six years, so he could not spend it all in one State.

Mr. CARAWAY. He could not spend $25,000,000 a year for 6 years, which would amount to $150,000,000, and take 10 years to spend in the District of Columbia $10,000,000 a year.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President—

Mr. FERNALD. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON. I heard the Senator's speech, and there is a portion of it that I can not agree to as an explanation of this bill. If there is any doubt about it, I am going to offer an amendment to cover it, and I understood the Senator to consent to it.

As I understand this bill, it is simply an authorization to the Appropriations Committee to appropriate $100,000,000. The Appropriations Committee can make the appropriation to the extent of $100,000,000 for the purposes indicated in this bill at such places, for such specific amounts, and at such times as it pleases, not exceeding $5,000,000 in any one State for the six years that this bill runs.

Mr. FERNALD. That is right.

Mr. SWANSON. That is simply an authorization. The Appropriations Committee can not appropriate until another committee makes an authorization. As I understand, all that this bill does—and if it does not do this I want to make it clear in the bill—is this: The Appropriations Committee can come in here and make a specific appropriation in any State for a specific amount, provided it does not exceed $5,000,000. Then, after it makes this appropriation for the specific amount, the Treasury Department is authorized to carry it out, and has the power to do so under this bill, provided it does not exceed this limitation.

Mr. OVERMAN. I call the Senator's attention to that one exception. This bill authorizes $60,000,000 to be spent. The President and the Budget send down to the committee a schedule showing where these buildings shall be constructed and the amounts to be expended. Now, for example, suppose the Budget sends down no appropriation for any building in my State. I want an appropriation, and I offer an amendment to provide one, but even if the committee allowed it somebody would raise the point of order that it was not estimated for by the Budget; so we are appropriating subject to the Budget and the President.

Mr. SWANSON. No; if the Senator will permit me, if the Appropriations Committee of the Senate makes an authorization it is in order under the rules of the Senate. If this amount is authorized, the amendment would be in order to that amount. The Senator might have difficulty in getting it through if the Secretary of the Treasury or the Postmaster General or the Department of Justice did not recommend a specific building.

Mr. OVERMAN. There is where the Senator is mistaken. If a particular amount is authorized for, say, Salisbury, N. C., that is in order; but if the Secretary of the Treasury and the Budget Committee and the President send down a certain amount for a certain building, we have to accept that. We can not authorize any other amount.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator how he interprets this language in the bill on that point?

That the Secretary of the Treasury shall submit annually and from time to time as may be required estimates to the Bureau of the Budget, in accordance with the provisions of the Budget and Accounting Act, 1921, showing in complete detail the various amounts it is proposed to expend under the authority of this act during the fiscal year for which said estimates are submitted.

So, before the proposition comes here, it must go to the Bureau of the Budget.

Mr. SWANSON. That is true, as everything in the nature of an appropriation for the Navy Department must go to the Budget Bureau, under the law, and every proposed appropriation for the War Department must go to the Budget Bureau.

Mr. FERNALD. If the Senator will permit, I will read that provision of the law.

Mr. SWANSON. I am going to draw an amendment. The only condition under which I will support this bill is that it shall be an authorization and that the ultimate fixing of the specific amounts for buildings will be left to the Appropriations Committee, which represents the different sections of the country. If that shall be done, the rights of all the States will be left to that committee to consider them, instead of following the old method under which the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds would consider them. If sections are treated with injustice, if sections do not get what they are entitled to and are discriminated against, they will have an opportunity when the appropriations come before us.

The only condition under which I will support this bill is that there shall be no contract for any building or site or change in location until the appropriation has been made by Congress, which would absolutely prevent the Treasury having the disposition of the money.

As I understand the purpose of the bill and the spirit in which it ought to be passed, it is to provide for emergencies in various sections of the country. It must go to the Budget Bureau, which has to approve it; then it will be sent to the Appropriations Committee, and the Appropriations Committee will determine whether the appropriation shall be made or not. In addition to that, I would provide that no contract shall be made or obligation entered into by any contractor until the appropriation is made.

Mr. SMITH. Let me ask the Senator this question before he takes his seat. We have authorized a specific lump sum. Then we have put limitations upon it to the extent that in no one State shall expenditures exceed $5,000,000 within a year. Why do we need to have the Budget pass upon it, when, as the Senator has said, we have appropriation committees which can hear the needs of the States, and, with the limitations already provided in the law, provide for the amounts necessary to meet what, in their judgment, is necessary to meet the emergencies which must come within the limitations of the measure?

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator ought to have made that objection when the Budget law was passed. You can not even get an improvement of a river or harbor, you can not even get an improvement in the navy yard at Norfolk or an arsenal, until the Budget passes on it. The Senator ought to have made that objection at the time the Budget bill was passed.

Mr. SMITH. The point I am making is this—

Mr. FERNALD. Will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. FERNALD. I am sorry to disturb these two distinguished lawyers, but I want to read them the proposed law. On page 7, section 4, the bill provides:

The Secretary of the Treasury shall submit annually and from time to time as may be required estimates to the Bureau of the Budget, in accordance with the provisions of the Budget and Accounting Act, 1921, showing in complete detail the various amounts it is proposed to expend under the authority of this act during the fiscal year for which said estimates are submitted.

Now just a little more. This is the law, and, as the Senator from Virginia has said, the Senator from South Carolina ought to have made his objection about two years ago. This covers the matter completely:

(b) Estimates for lump-sum appropriations contained in the Budget or transmitted under section 203 shall be accompanied by statements showing, in such detail and form as may be necessary to inform Congress, the manner of expenditure of such appropriations and of the corresponding appropriations for the fiscal year in progress and the last completed fiscal year. Such statements shall be in lieu of statements of like character now required by law.

That covers the whole thing.

Mr. SMITH. If the Senator will allow me, the Senator from Virginia said I should have made my objection two years ago. This has nothing to do with the law now providing for the Budget, because this has anticipated what the Budget may do by an act of Congress making an appropriation for a specific lump sum. When there is no authorization, they state within a certain amount just what they suggest can be expended.

Mr. SWANSON. If I understand the practice of the Budget Bureau, they sometimes do recommend new projects, but mostly they are confined to authorizations of Congress. If we left this out, it would be subject to a point of order.

I have an amendment to offer. My support of the bill, I told the Senator, would be dependent upon an amendment being agreed to providing that no contract shall be made for a building, or a modification, until a specific appropriation has been made for it by Congress.

Mr. SMITH. That is exactly what I am trying to get now.

Mr. SWANSON. I am not willing to let the Secretary of the Treasury or the Postmaster General take a hundred million dollars and say where he will put it. All they can do under the present Budget law is to recommend, under authorizations, where they think something ought to be done; where they think the greatest emergency is. It then comes up to the committees to pass on their estimates and recommendations, and I felt that I would like to have an amendment made to this bill, because every member of the committee reserved the right to offer and vote for any amendment he saw proper. There is no compulsion on a single member of the committee, from the chairman down, to support the bill. We reserved the right to vote for any amendment, to do as we pleased when it got to the Senate.

This bill is being offered in order to get the best results, to get rid of a bad condition in the country, a congestion of business in the cities. If any other way can be found under our system of appropriations by which it can be handled, I would be very glad to support any measure along that line, giving Congress more power; unless we could have a bill, as we used to have, providing an authorization for specific buildings. Such a bill was offered in the House, but it was beaten 2 to 1.

Mr. HARRISON. Why can not we have such a bill?

Mr. SWANSON. We could not get it through.

Mr. HARRISON. Why could we not get it through? Of course, we could not get it through if Senators would not support it.

Mr. SWANSON. We would be two months on it in the Senate—

Mr. FERNALD. In the first place, this bill passed the House—

Mr. HARRISON. It passed the House under a suspension of the rules, which allowed no amendment to be offered, with only 40 minutes debate.

Mr. SWANSON. I think a motion to recommit, with an amendment, was offered by a Representative from the Senator's State.

Mr. HARRISON. I am not sure about that.

Mr. SMITH. I think the amendment the Senator from Virginia is proposing to offer is exactly in line with what I have been claiming; that under the specific limitations of the bill a committee of Congress could within the limitations in the bill make certain recommendations that would carry out the purpose of the bill, rather than leave it to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. I propose to offer certain amendments even to section 3, to prevent him having that absolute power.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I want to suggest a possible situation to the Senator from South Carolina and ask what the procedure would be under the framework, the plan, of this bill?

Let us suppose that the Director of the Budget, or the Secretary of the Treasury, cooperating with the Postmaster General, should recommend a post office, one building, for the Senator's

State where he thought there was an urgent need for another post-office building in another city in South Carolina. How would the Senator go about to secure the other post-office building under the scheme and philosophy of this bill?

Mr. SMITH. Under the provisions here $100,000,000 is set aside for the benefit of 48 States, limiting each State to $5,000,000.

Mr. HARRISON. Annually.

Mr. SMITH. Annually; providing that not more than $5,000,000 may be expended in any one State. I think we ought to have a provision in the bill under which a committee of Congress would have the authority to pass upon and authorize what should be done in their judgment after hearing testimony, rather than leaving it to the Secretary of the Treasury or the Budget, because we have limited the amount to each State, and we have limited the total lump sum, which is already covered, in effect, in the bill. I would leave it to the proper committee of Congress to say what a State could or could not have within the limitations of the proposed act.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have offered an amendment which will cover that particular point.

Mr. SMITH. I would like to ask the Senator from California if he agrees with my position.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I am inclined to agree with the Senator.

Mr. SWANSON. The junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] has drawn an amendment at my request which I think carries out my idea in connection with requiring the appropriations to be made by Congress before a contract can be entered into. I recognize that all this power should not be given to any one political party, whether it is mine or not, and I stated to the Senator and the Senator led me to understand that he would accept an amendment which would prevent the making of any contracts before the money had been appropriated. I leave that point to the Senate.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. That may be wise, but might it not unduly delay matters and frustrate a very good plan?

Mr. SMITH. It might delay matters with some people who thought they would be specially favored in getting this money, but there will not be any delay of the general public business, I assure the Senator. If he goes along with the rest of us, there will be no delay.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be read here, if the Senator from Maine does not object.

Mr. FERNALD. I do not object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the proposed amendment.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no contract shall be entered into for the erection of any building or modification thereof which is to be paid for out of the authorization herein provided until the appropriation therefor shall be made by act of Congress.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator why he does not include the purchase of sites, too? The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to buy sites whenever he wants to do so.

Mr. SWANSON. I presume that sites ought to be included.

Mr. FESS. That absolutely nullifies the purpose of the entire bill.

Mr. HARRISON. If it does, it does exactly what I want to do.

Mr. FESS. I know that is what the Senator is trying to do.

Mr. CARAWAY. May I ask the Senator from Ohio in what way it nullifies the purpose of the bill?

Mr. FESS. It means that you can not have any authorization for the location of a public building, even after the bill is passed, until Congress so specifies by special act, which never will be done, because everybody else will be wanting to come in.

Mr. SWANSON. It does not mean any such thing.

Mr. FESS. It introduces the "pork-barrel" element.

Mr. SWANSON. If this is not included, it simply means that we would give the power to appropriate money to the Treasury Department, which I shall never vote for, and which is contrary to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. FESS. No; we appropriate—

Mr. SWANSON. No; we do not appropriate. The bill simply makes an authorization. It is a fundamental principle of the Constitution that no appropriation of public money can be made except by a vote of Congress. The great question in connection with the bill is this: Could the Treasury Department make a contract for the whole $100,000,000 and then come and compel Congress to make an appropriation in pursuance of the contract it had no authority to make? This merely prohibits the making of contracts under the authorization until the appropriation is made for them, which is in accordance with our Constitution.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maine yield for a question?

Mr. FERNALD. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Ohio mentioned the question of "pork barrel." I was wondering if the bill offered by the able Senator from Maine is intended to make the Treasury Department the "pork barrel" and transfer the duties of the "pork barrel," as heretofore discharged, as it is alleged, by Congress, to the Treasury Department?

Mr. FERNALD. I have not alleged that it was a "pork barrel" bill.

Mr. FESS. Will the Senator from Maine yield?

Mr. FERNALD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. FESS. The bill is not an appropriation bill. The bill is an authorization for an appropriation to the amount of $150,000,000 or $165,000,000 to be applied as indicated in the bill. Whenever there is a necessity for the expenditure of any part of the $150,000,000 or $165,000,000 for the erection of any building or otherwise, it will, of course, have to be reported to the Senate by the Appropriations Committee and passed upon by the Senate, because we do not appropriate in the bill now before us. We simply authorize the appropriation. If the Senator means that there should be no act in the way of public-building activities until we specifically in each case have an act of Congress with reference to it, we would get nowhere.

Mr. SWANSON. There is a doubt in the bill as I construe it. I understood the Senator from Maine to say he would accept a provision that no contract should be made until the appropriation was actually made.

Mr. FERNALD. If the Senator will allow me to read from the bill, I do not think there will be any trouble about understanding it. Let me read just one section. Section 4 on page 7 of the bill reads as follows:

SEC. 4. The Secretary of the Treasury shall submit annually and from time to time as may be required estimates to the Bureau of the Budget, in accordance with the provisions of the budget and accounting act, 1921, showing in complete detail the various amounts it is proposed to expend under the authority of this act during the fiscal year for which said estimates are submitted.

Mr. SWANSON. There is only this issue between us, as I said, about the language. The Senator has the idea that no contract should be made until there has been an appropriation. I say we should make it clear that no contract can be made to provide for the expenditure of the whole $100,000,000 until a committee of the Senate reports a bill making an appropriation. With such a provision I would have no objection to the present bill; but if the bill will allow contracts to be made for the entire authorization and then we have to wait to get the appropriations under the authorizations, I am not in favor of it.

Mr. FESS. There can not be a single dollar used under the bill until Congress appropriates it.

Mr. SWANSON. That is all right, but I simply want to make it stronger and provide that the Secretary of the Treasury can not enter into contracts until the money is actually appropriated.

Mr. FESS. We can not make it any stronger than the language of the bill is now.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. FERNALD. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Replying to the thought of the Senator from Virginia, if he will do me the honor to give me his attention, might it not be well to provide that the Secretary could make contracts subject to future authorization or future appropriation? Do we want to deny him the power to enter into a provisional contract? The Senator catches my thought, I hope, by the question.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator from California wants to make contracts subject to approval by Congress?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Yes.

Mr. SWANSON. I do not see any trouble about the matter. If all sections of the country are going to be treated equally and fairly, which they ought to be, I do not see why we should make a contract to erect a $10,000,000 building at this or that place until the appropriations are actually made which would authorize it. What would be the objection to that procedure?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. We could enter into a contract provisionally or subject to future action by Congress. Let us not deny the Secretary of the Treasury the power to enter into a contract subject to a condition subsequent.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. FERNALD. I yield.

Mr. OVERMAN. My proposed amendment would save a lot of trouble if the Senator would agree to it, and I hope he will accept it, and that is that the $100,000,000 shall be distributed among the States according to their population. Everybody would be treated share and share alike under such an arrangement. North Carolina would get her share, Maine would get her share, and California would get her share.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not think Nevada would get anything anyway.

Mr. OVERMAN. Nevada would get $75,000, but will not get anything under the bill as now written. California would get $3,500,000.

Mr. SMOOT. The bill would have to be rewritten if we accepted such an amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will not the Senator permit the bill to go back to the committee so that the committee may give some further consideration to the question and to the suggestions which have been made?

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, we have been considering the measure all winter. We can not give it any more sincere consideration than we have done.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President—

Mr. FERNALD. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. I would like to have read an amendment which I intend to propose at the proper time, to see if the Senator, after it is read, has any objection to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the amendment to be proposed by the Senator from Nevada.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. Add a new section at the end of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 8. Any and all appropriations proposed, requested, or made for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act shall be included in a separate bill to be known as the public buildings appropriation bill. Appropriations for other purposes than those herein provided shall not be included in such public buildings appropriation bill.

Mr. FERNALD. Of course, I could not accept that amendment. It would carry us back to the old system.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not see why the Senator can not accept the amendment which I have offered, anyway.

Mr. FERNALD. I could not accept it, of course.

Mr. OVERMAN. What is the trouble with the amendment which I have proposed? It would give every taxpayer in the United States a share.

Mr. FERNALD. The trouble is that New York and Pennsylvania would get one-fifth of the appropriations.

Mr. OVERMAN. They will get more than one-fifth under the pending bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, let me call attention to some figures, if the Senator from Maine will allow me.

Mr. FERNALD. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I will merely make the statement, and the Senator from Virginia can look it up. There are some States in the Union that are better fixed to-day for governmental buildings than other States. I frankly say that they are the largest States of the Union.

Mr. OVERMAN. They will get just as much under the pending bill if we leave it as it is.

Mr. SMOOT. They certainly would if we adopted the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. What is the population of Utah?

Mr. SMOOT. We have about 525,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is the proportion that Utah would get, and they would not get it under the present bill.

Mr. SMOOT. We will take our chances.

Mr. OVERMAN. Unless the Senator is a good politician.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I am not a politician.

Mr. OVERMAN. There is the trouble with the bill. Human nature is the same the world over, and I would not trust any three men in any party to distribute $60,000,000 to favor this section or that section or so as to help elect this man or that man to Congress.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not believe the Secretary of the Treasury would dare to do an injustice to any part of the country. I know that if I were Secretary of the Treasury politics would make no difference with me; I would treat all alike, as I think the appropriation bills in the past have done.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I say that I regret the remark made by the Senator from North Carolina. I do not agree with him about the Senator from Utah. He said that he does not think Utah would get anything under the pending bill. I think that Utah would have perhaps more than any other State if the bill should pass.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator gives me too much credit and gives my colleague [Mr. KING] too much credit. I do not think it is possible to do that. Not only that, but I would not think of asking more than Mississippi will get. I would be content, and I will agree with the Senator from Mississippi right now that Utah shall not have one-half of the amount Mississippi will get.

Mr. HARRISON. I know Mississippi will not get anything, and I know Utah will get all it wants.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not worried about it at all. Mississippi will get her share just as sure as the sun will rise to-morrow morning.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I insist that Gulfport, Miss., shall have a new post-office building.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, I have been on my feet as long as I ought this afternoon. I should be glad to have a vote. I do not think it is necessary to make any more of a speech. I have tried to explain the bill as best I could and to answer all questions Senators have propounded. We have given the entire afternoon to the consideration of the bill. I shall be glad now to consider the amendments. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments be considered as they are reached in the reading of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, Nos. 1 and 5, to the bill (H. R. 9341) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1927, and for other purposes; agreed to the further conference requested by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. Wood, Mr. WASON, and Mr. SANDLIN were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

OCCUPATION OF HAITI

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have read a resolution. I regret that my physical condition does not permit me to discuss it, as I had intended to do this afternoon, but I give notice that at an early day I shall speak upon the situation in Haiti. I ask that the resolution may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the resolution.

The legislative clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 202), as follows:

Resolution

Whereas it is claimed that the following statement contains some of the important facts relating to Haiti and its occupation by military forces of the United States and also some of the important occurrences following such occupation, together with facts relating to existing conditions in Haiti, which said statement is as follows, to wit:

That the people of Haiti achieved their political independence in 1804 and established a republican form of government, under which the Haitian people controlled their political affairs without interruption or interference from foreign powers until the military seizure and occupation of Haiti by the United States on July 28, 1915, which occupation has continued to this day without the consent of the Haitian people;

That there was no sufficient reason for the American occupation of Haiti, the disturbances in said country being purely of an internal character and in no wise affecting the lives and liberty of Americans or other foreigners;

That after the seizure of Haiti the admiral in charge of the American forces of occupation declared martial law and took control of the Government of the Haitian Republic, interfering in the election of the President of Haiti in August, 1915, and exerting military pressure and other influence, which resulted in the election of Dartiguenave as President of Haiti;

That the United States presented to said Dartiguenave and to the National Assembly of Haiti, consisting of two legislative bodies provided in the constitution of Haiti, a proposed convention giving to the United States control of the revenues, police, public works, and sanitary administration of Haiti, which convention the national assembly was unwilling to ratify, whereupon the admiral in command of said American forces cut off the salaries of the opposing members of the assembly and announced that if the tendered treaty was not ratified the United States "has the intention to retain control in Haiti until the desired end is accomplished, and that it will forthwith proceed with the complete pacification of Haiti," under pressure of which threat the national assembly accepted such convention, which had been signed on the 16th day of September, 1915;

That a new National Assembly of Haiti was elected in 1916, and upon the convening of the same the United States presented to said assembly a proposed new constitution for Haiti, whereby the provisions of the then Haitian constitution which forbade foreigners and foreign corporations from owning Haitian lands were substituted by provisions which authorized the holding of Haitian lands by foreigners and foreign corporations, and made other changes in the constitution, all of which, and particularly the provisions permitting the holding of lands by foreigners, were not acceptable to the National Assembly of Haiti, which refused to accept such new constitution, whereupon the military forces of the United States summarily and arbitrarily dissolved the national assembly, took forcible possession of the legislative chambers, and locked the same against members of the assembly, and when the houses of the assembly met in other places they were summarily and forcibly dispersed by American military power;

That thereupon an election was called for the alleged purpose of having said new constitution submitted to the people for ratification; that there was in fact no election or true expression of the people; that a few votes were cast under the supervision and control of the military forces of the United States and conditions and circumstances which clearly indicated that the wishes of the people of Haiti were not expressed and that said new constitution was not in fact ratified by the people;

That upon the dissolution of said national assembly said Dartiguenave, by dictatorial decree, set up a so-called council of state, appointing all the members thereof, which was an extraconstitutional and illegal body and which usurped and attempted to take over and exercise the legislative powers of the National Assembly of Haiti, and it has continued from that time until the present to exercise said usurpatory authority in defiance of the will and desire of the people of Haiti;

That the term of office of said Dartiguenave expired August 12, 1922, and thereupon, as it is claimed, the United States selected Louis Borno to be his successor; that said council of state had no power or authority to act in the premises, but the members of said illegal organization, with the support and under the direction of the American military occupation, pretended to elect as President of Haiti said Louis Borno, although said Borno was not eligible for the Presidency of the Haitian Republic because he is not a son of a Haitian citizen, as prescribed by the constitution of Haiti;

That under the new constitution of Haiti, as well as the void and unratified constitution, the two legislative bodies of the Haitian Government were empowered to meet as a national assembly and to elect, at the time designated in said old constitution, as well as at the time provided in said new constitution, the President of the Haitian Republic;

That said council of state, in the manner stated and in defiance of said provisions, pretended to elect said Borno for the term of four years, the period prescribed in the so-called new constitution, which the National Assembly of Haiti had refused to accept;

That the constitution of Haiti, as well as the new constitution, sought to be imposed on the Haitians, provides for the election of the members of the two legislative bodies of the Haitian Republic, but since the suppression of said bodies no elections have been held, or permitted to be held, by those in control of Haiti, as a result of which no national assembly existed to choose the President of Haiti, as provided in said constitutions;

That under the terms of the new constitution a president of Haiti was to have been chosen by the national assembly on the 12th day of April, 1926, but said assembly, having been abolished by the military forces of the United States and the dictatorial decree of Dartiguenave, said council of state, with the approval and support of the military forces of the United States, pretended, on said day, to reelect said Borno as President for a further term of four years; that it has been understood for many months that Borno aspired to another term as President and was supported for such position by General Russell, if not the State Department of the United States, and to bring about that result said Borno has within the last year appointed 18 of the 21 members of the council of state from among his relatives, personal friends, and retainers in order that he might be assured of his reelection on April 12 of this year;

That the term of said convention of September 16, 1915, expired on September 15, 1926; that if the United States had any right under said convention to occupy Haiti and control its Government and the people of Haiti, such right no longer exists, and the further presence of the United States in Haiti means continued usurpation of the constitution, laws, and Government of Haiti and the subversion of the civil liberties of the Haitian people by superior military forces;

That it is claimed that the actual Government of Haiti is in the hands of General Russell, who is supported by the military forces of the United States; that Borno and said council of state are subject to his will and act in accordance with directions given by him; that the liberties of the people are restricted, the freedom of the press abridged, the independence of the courts interfered with, the voice of the people in the matter of levying taxes and expending them silenced, the right of franchise denied, and the people of Haiti subjected to a foreign dictatorship which attempts to screen its power behind Haitian agencies which it has set up and through which it operates;

That there will be no correction of these conditions and no restoration of civil government and constitutional authority in Haiti until the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate shall be elected by the people of Haiti, and shall, in turn, as an electoral body, elect the President of Haiti under the terms of the Haitian constitution;

That the suppression of civil authority by military power is contrary to the Constitution of the United States and those principles of political and civil liberty which are professed by the Government and the people of the United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations is directed to consider the statements and claims herein set forth and report to the Senate measures which shall permit the Haitian people to set up and establish a government of their own choice and assume control of their own Government and their own civil and political affairs, and which shall provide for the withdrawal from Haiti of all military forces of the United States and all officers—military, naval, and otherwise—except only regularly accredited diplomatic representatives or consular agents as may be agreed upon by the Government of the United States and the Government of the Haitian Republic.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the resolution which I have offered demands the earnest consideration of the Senate. In my judgment Congress should promptly deal with the Haitian question and terminate a situation which is intolerable to the Haitians and inconsistent with American policies and in contravention of the spirit of democratic institutions. I intended to discuss the resolution to-day and the acts of American occupation, but illness prevents me from so doing.

May I say that since preparing the resolution yesterday I have learned that Mr. Borno has been made President for another term of four years, notwithstanding his disqualification. Supported by the United States and General Russell and American marines he was "selected" by the so-called council of state, an illegal body, 18 members of which he appointed during the past 12 months. At an early day, Mr. President, I shall attempt to discuss the general conditions existing in Haiti and the course of the United States in Haitian matters.

Mr. CURTIS. I understand the resolution offered by the Senator from Utah will lie on the table.

Mr. KING. I ask that the resolution may lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

ALIENATION OF SOVEREIGNTY

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, some 10 days or more ago when the learned Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] was discussing in passing the Philippine question in some of its aspects I ventured to inquire of him whether, in his opinion, Congress is empowered to alienate the sovereignty of the United States, and the Senator made a certain reply.

Mr. KING. I said Congress could do so.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Then followed a brief colloquy between us and other Senators. I now ask unanimous consent to have published in the RECORD an article on this subject written by Mr. Daniel R. Williams, which appeared in the Virginia Law Review. I think it is a very instructive article, and will perhaps be read with profit by those who are interested in subjects which may hereafter come up and be discussed in the Senate.

Mr. CURTIS rose.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator from Kansas will permit me, I wish to say to the Senator from California that the United States did make a treaty with Great Britain by the terms of which we ceded to Great Britain a portion of American territory north of what is now the boundary line between the United States and Canada. So we have exercised that right which the United States possesses to cede away American territory.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. My reply to that remark, Mr. President, is, with great respect for my friend's historical knowledge and his profound legal learning, that we did nothing of the sort. I further make the statement that we never have up to this minute ceded or alienated our sovereignty over one square inch of American territory. However, I do not propose now to enter into that discussion.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator from California has forgotten that we gave away the Isle of Pines.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. No; we did not give away the Isle of Pines. We never had title to or sovereignty over the Isle of Pines by virtue of our treaty with Spain. The treaty of Paris ceded and conveyed to the United States sovereignty over Porto Rico and the Philippines, but it did not convey or cede to us sovereignty over the Isle of Pines.

Mr. COPELAND. I would say, for the relief of the Presiding Officer and of my friend from California, that I am not going to repeat the eight-hour speech which I made on that subject which convinced me that the Senator from California was mistaken.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. But it did not convince the Senate.

Mr. CURTIS obtained the floor.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CURTIS. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I certainly will not now enter into a discussion over this important question. I do not intend to do so; but replying to my friend from New York [Mr. COPELAND], I ask him to remember that the treaty of Paris specifically conveyed or alienated the sovereignty of Spain over the Philippines and Porto Rico to the United States of America. Inasmuch as this question of the competency of Congress to surrender and alienate our sovereignty over territory may come up for discussion, I invite attention to the argument of Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course, learned Senators are aware that what a certain number in the Philippines are now demanding, a number in Porto Rico are demanding; and if we are to surrender sovereignty over the Philippines we shall be asked in a short time to surrender sovereignty over Porto Rico. So that this question of the power of Congress under the Constitution to pull down the American flag and surrender sovereignty is a very important one.

I ask that the article to which I have referred may appear in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the article will be printed in the RECORD.

The article is as follows:

IS CONGRESS EMPOWERED TO ALIENATE SOVEREIGNTY OF THE UNITED STATES?

(With special reference to the Philippine Islands)

While planted in general terms, our inquiry as to the constitutional right of Congress to alienate sovereignty will be examined here with special reference to the Philippine Islands, where, if at all, the issue will likely arise.

ACQUISITION OF THE PHILIPPINES AND VALIDITY OF TITLE

By treaty with Spain, ratified in February, 1899, the Philippine Archipelago, theretofore held under Spanish sovereignty, was ceded to the United States. Construing the force and effect of this cession, our Supreme Court, speaking through Chief Justice Fuller in the Diamond Rings case (183 U. S. 176, 179), said:

"By the third article of the treaty Spain ceded to the United States 'the archipelago known as the Philippine Islands,' and the United States agreed to pay Spain the sum of $20,000,000 within three months. The treaty was ratified; Congress appropriated the money; the ratification was proclaimed. The treaty-making power, the executive power, the legislative power, concurred in the completion of the transaction.

"The Philippines thereby ceased, in the language of the treaty, 'to be Spanish.' Ceasing to be Spanish, they ceased to be foreign country. They came under the complete and absolute sovereignty and dominion of the United States, and so became territory of the United States over which civil government could be established. The result was the same, although there was no stipulation that the native inhabitants should be incorporated into the body politic and none securing to them the right to choose their nationality. Their allegiance became due to the United States, and they became entitled to its protection.

"The Philippines, like Porto Rico, became, by virtue of the treaty, ceded conquered territory or territory ceded by way of indemnity. . . . The Philippines were not simply occupied but acquired, and having been granted and delivered to the United States by their former master, were no longer under the sovereignty of any foreign nation." (Italics supplied.) (Ibid., p. 173.)

Spain's sovereign rights over the Philippine Islands were clearer than are those of most modern countries to their national territory. When Spanish sovereignty was extended to such islands in 1565 no "Filipino nation" was destroyed or supplanted, for none existed. The then inhabitants, estimated at 500,000 and occupying limited areas of the coastal plains, were split into numerous tribal groups, speaking different dialects, and altogether lacking in homogeneity or union. These tribes—of Malay origin—were themselves invaders, the aborigines being the pygmy blacks now known as Negritos, of whom possibly 30,000 are still extant. In the exercise of her dominion Spain took over the unoccupied and unclaimed areas of the archipelago—agricultural, forest, and mineral—and held and administered them as crown lands for over three centuries. At no time, either then or later, were these lands ever owned, occupied, or claimed as the territory or patrimony of any Philippine tribe or Filipino body politic. Upon American occupation this "public domain" constituted over 63,000,000 acres, or 80 per cent of the total land area of the islands, while 40 per cent of the archipelago is still given over to Pagan and Mohammedan peoples, numbering approximately 1,000,000.

By conquest, purchase, and treaty, therefore, Spain's sovereignty over the Philippines, together with her title to these crown lands and other public holdings in the islands, passed to the United States. Referring to the validity and completeness of this conveyance, Chief Justice Fuller stated in the Diamond Rings case (Ibid., p. 180):

"The sovereignty of Spain over the Philippines and possession under claim of title had existed for a long series of years prior to the war with the United States. The fact that there were insurrections against her, or that uncivilized tribes may have defied her will, do not affect the validity of her title. She granted the islands to the United States, and the grantee in accepting them took nothing less than the whole grant." (Italics supplied.)

SOVEREIGNTY UNDER OUR FORM OF GOVERNMENT IS IN THE PEOPLE

The proposition is elementary that in the United States "the people are sovereign." Inasmuch, however, as there is a growing tendency on the part of Americans generally to forget or ignore the fact and to acquiesce in the gradual encroachment upon their rights by governmental agencies, it is well to stress the point. How our system of government differs in this regard from those of European countries (as existing in 1797) was clearly brought out by Chief Justice Jay in the early case of Chisholm v. Georgia (2 U. S. 419, 471), where he said:

"Sovereignty is the right to govern; a nation or state sovereign is the person or persons in whom that resides; in Europe the sovereignty is generally ascribed to the prince; here it rests with the people; there the sovereign actually administers the government; here, never in a single instance; our governors are the agents of the people and at most stand in the same relation to their sovereign in which regents in Europe stand to their sovereigns. Their princes have personal powers, dignities, and preeminences; our rulers have none but official; nor do they partake in the sovereignty otherwise or in any other capacity than as private citizens."

The same principle was thus stated by Justice McLean in Spooner v. McConnell (Fed. Cas. No. 13249):

"The sovereignty of a state does not reside in the persons who fill the different departments of the government but in the people from whom the government emanates and who may change it at their discretion. Sovereignty, then, in this country abides with the constituency and not with the agent, and this is true both in reference to the Federal and State Governments."

In Yick Wo v. Hopkins (118 U. S. 356, 369) our Supreme Court, per Matthews, J., said:

"When we consider the nature and theory of our institutions of government, the principles upon which they are supposed to rest, and to review the history of their development, we are constrained to conclude that they do not mean to leave room for the play and action of purely personal and arbitrary power. Sovereignty itself is, of course, not subject to law, for it is the author and source of law; but in our system, while sovereign powers are delegated to the agencies of government, sovereignty itself remains with the people, by whom and for whom all government exists and acts. And the law is the definition and limitation of power."

It follows as a consequence that sovereignty over all territory belonging to or acquired by the United States is vested in the American people as a whole, and is held for their use and benefit. This principle, which is fundamental, finds expression in Shively v. Bowlby (152 U. S. 1, 57), as follows:

"Upon the acquisition of a territory by the United States, whether by cession from one of the States or by a treaty with a foreign country, or by discovery and settlement, the same title and dominion passed to the United States for the benefit of the whole people and in trust for the several States to be ultimately created out of the territory." (Italics supplied.) (Cited and approved in Morris v. United States, 174 U. S. 190, 237.)

In Dred Scott v. Sandford (19 How. (U. S.) 893, 448) Chief Justice Taney, referring to the powers and limitations of the General Government over territories, stated:

"A power in the General Government to obtain and hold colonies and dependent territories, over which they might legislate without restriction, would be inconsistent with its own existence in its present form. Whatever it acquires it acquires for the benefit of the people of the several States who created it. It is their trustee, acting for them and charged with the duty of promoting the interests of the whole people of the Union in the exercise of the powers specifically granted."

"At the time when the territory in question was obtained by cession from France it contained no population fit to be associated together and admitted as a State; and it therefore was absolutely necessary to hold possession of it, as a territory belonging to the United States, until it was settled and inhabited by a civilized community capable of self-government and in a condition to be admitted on equal terms with the other States as a member of the Union. But, as we have before said, it was acquired by the General Government as the representative and trustee of the people of the United States, and it must therefore be held in that character for their common and equal benefit; for it was the people of the several States, acting through their agent and representative, the Federal Government, who in fact acquired the territory in question, and the Government holds it for their common use until it shall be associated with the other States as a member of the Union. (Italics supplied.)

It results, therefore, that when the United States, as indemnity for a war financed by the American people, and through payment of $20,000,000 of public funds, acquired from Spain "the complete and absolute sovereignty and dominion" over the Philippines, this sovereignty, together with the ownership of Spain's public holdings in the islands, became and is now vested in "the people of the United States." The acquisition was for their use and benefit as principal, and is now subject to their exclusive control and disposition. Neither Congress nor any other governmental agency has authority or jurisdiction to alienate this sovereignty, or to convey or compromise these rights, except as the power so to do may have been delegated to or conferred upon them by "the sovereign owners."

ALIENATION OF SOVEREIGNTY

Since the United States became a nation—now nearly 150 years—not a square foot of territory once brought under the American flag has ever been alienated. In certain cases of disputed boundaries or where question of title was involved there have been adjustments, but the record discloses no single instance where sovereignty, admittedly vested in the people of the United States, has been transferred or withdrawn. Lacking, therefore, any concrete case of alienation, either attempted or consummated, the issue whether or not Congress has constitutional authority in the premises has never come before our courts for decision. It is only now, after the lapse of a century and a half, and this through proposals by Congress to alienate United States sovereignty over the Philippines, that controversy has arisen and the subject acquired other than academic interest.

Scarcely was the treaty with Spain ratified and our title to and sovereignty over the Philippines become a fact, than agitation began looking to their alienation. The question thus precipitated was, unfortunately, seized upon by party leaders as a "political issue," and the fate of the islands and their people became thereafter a pawn in the game of partisan politics. This action was taken despite the fact that Americans generally were altogether uninformed as to Philippine conditions or the needs of the situation, and in the full knowledge that such "imported issue" would have no actual bearing or influence upon election returns nor represent in any way the considered judgment of our electors upon the policy to be adopted. The Democratic party aligned itself with those favoring abandonment of the islands and announced it to be the "paramount issue" of the presidential campaign of 1900. Subsequent platforms of such party have carried analogous planks, that for 1924 advocating the immediate grant of Philippine independence.

In 1916 the United States Senate, then Democratic, passed a bill providing for absolute Philippine independence in not less than two nor more than four years, which bill was defeated in the lower House by a narrow margin. In the act finally agreed upon by both Houses in August, 1916, a preamble thereto recites (among other things) that—

"It is, as it has always been, the purpose of the people of the United States to withdraw their sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and to recognize their independence as soon as a stable government can be established therein."

The truth of this allegation, or at least the authority of a partisan majority in Congress, largely influenced by political commitments, to thus categorically interpret the will of the American people as to the Philippines, might well be questioned were it relevant to our present inquiry. Our only concern here, however, is to evidence that Congress (irrespective of party) has uniformly acted on the assumption that it is vested with authority to alienate the Philippines at its pleasure, and that this idea has thus far gone largely unchallenged. Doubtless the quiescent attitude of our press and public as to the "mandate" or authority of Congress upon such a vital matter finds explanation in the nature of the proposed alienation, i. e., the grant of independence to the Filipino people. Had Congress evidenced the less sentimental purpose of making a gratuitous transfer of the Philippines to Japan, or like foreign power, including title to 63,000,000 acres of public domain of the United States—comprising 80 per cent of the land area of the archipelago—the reaction of our public to any such proposition and the denial of authority in the premises would unquestionably have been immediate and pronounced. And yet Congress can do this very thing if the power heretofore assumed by it as to the Philippines actually exists.

This disposition of our people to endow Congress with practically unlimited powers, and to acquiesce in measures by that body utterly unrelated to its legislative functions, is thus diagnosed by Cooley in his Constitutional Limitations (Cooley, Constitutional Limitations, 7th Ed., 124):

"It is natural that we should incline to measure the power of the legislative department in America by the power of the like department in Great Britain; and to concede without reflection that whatever the legislature of the country, from which we derive our laws, can do, may also be done by the department created for the exercise of legislative authority in this country. But to guard against being misled by a comparison between the two, we must bear in mind the important distinction already pointed out, that with the Parliament rests practically the sovereignty of the country, so that it may exercise all the powers of the government if it wills so to do; while on the other hand, the legislatures of the American States are not the sovereign authority, and, though vested with the exercise of one branch of the sovereignty, they are nevertheless, in wielding it, hedged in on all sides by important limitations, some of which are imposed in express terms and others by implications which are equally imperative."

Given the present trend of international interest to the Pacific, and the constantly increasing political and commercial bearing of the Philippines upon the whole Far Eastern situation, wisdom would counsel that the constitutional right of Congress to alienate such islands, or to state "the purpose" of the people of the United States with respect thereto, should be thoroughly canvassed and determined beforehand. Particularly is this true when we consider that should the Philippines once be actually cut adrift by congressional act, or a specific date fixed for our withdrawal therefrom, it might then be difficult, if not impossible, for the American people, in whom sovereignty is vested, to raise the question of authority effectually.

HAVE THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES DELEGATED TO CONGRESS THE RIGHT TO ALIENATE SOVEREIGNTY?

Here again it is elementary that if the power to alienate territory of the United States exists in Congress, such authority must be found in the Constitution, which instrument defines and limits the measure of sovereignty surrendered by the people. Cooley, in his Principles of Constitutional Law, says (Cooley, Principles of Constitutional Law, 29-31):

"The government created by the Constitution is one of limited and enumerated powers, and the Constitution is the measure and the test of the powers conferred. Whatever is not conferred is withheld and belongs to the several States and the people thereof. * * *

"The Congress of the United States derives its powers to legislate from the Constitution, which is the measure of its authority; and any enactment of Congress which is opposed to its provisions, or is not within the grant of powers made by it, is unconstitutional, and therefore no law, and obligatory upon no one."

In McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheat. (U. S.) 316, 405), Chief Justice Marshall thus definitely stated the proposition:

"The government of the Union, then, is, emphatically and truly, a government of the people. In form and in substance it emanates from them. Its powers are granted by them and are to be exercised directly on them and for their benefit. This Government is acknowledged by all to be one of enumerated powers. The principle, that it can exercise only the powers granted to it, would seem too apparent to have required to be enforced by all those arguments which its enlightened friends, while it was depending before the people, found it necessary to urge. That principle is now universally admitted."

A comprehensive statement of the limitations imposed upon the general government by the Constitution, and the course to be pursued should further powers become necessary, is found in Kansas v. Colorado (208 U. S. 46, 89). The court, speaking through Mr. Justice Brewer, said:

"But the proposition that there are legislative powers affecting the Nation as a whole, which belong to, although not expressed in the grant of powers [in the Constitution], is in direct conflict with the doctrine that this is a Government of enumerated powers."

"That this is such a Government clearly appears from the Constitution, independently of the amendments, for otherwise there would be an instrument granting certain specified things made operative to grant other and distinct things."

"This natural construction of the original body of the Constitution is made absolutely certain by the tenth amendment. This amendment, which was seemingly adopted with prescience of just such contention as the present disclosed the widespread fear that the National Government might, under the pressure of a supposed general welfare, attempt to exercise powers which had not been granted. With equal determination the framers intended that no such assumption should ever find justification in the organic act, and that if, in the future, further powers seemed necessary, they should be granted by the people in the manner they had provided for amending that act. [Italics supplied.] It reads: 'The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.' The argument of counsel ignores the principal factor in this article, to wit, 'the people.' Its principal purpose was not the distribution of power between the United States and the States, but a reservation to the people of all powers not granted. The preamble of the Constitution declares who framed it—'We, the people of the United States'; not the people of one State but the people of all the States, and Article X reserves to the people of all the States the powers not delegated to the United States.

"The last paragraph of the section [sec. 8, Art. I], which authorizes Congress 'to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof,' is not the delegation of a new and independent power, but simply provision for making effective the powers theretofore mentioned. * * * No independent and unmentioned power passes to the National Government or can rightfully be exercised by the Congress." (Ibid., p. 88.)

The right to alienate sovereignty is not among the enumerated powers of Congress. It further appears that an attempt to incorporate such a power was rejected by the framers of the Constitution. In the convention of the State of Virginia which met on June 2, 1788, to consider the question of ratification of the Federal Constitution an amendment was proposed providing as follows (see Snow, The Administration of Dependencies, 470):

"No treaty ceding, contracting, restraining, or suspending the territorial rights or claims of the United States, or any of them * * * shall be made, but in cases of the most urgent and extreme necessity, nor shall any such treaty be ratified without the concurrence of three-fourths of the whole number of the Members of both Houses, respectively."

Gov. Edmund Randolph, who headed the Virginia delegation in the convention and presented the Virginia resolutions, opposed such amendment, saying (Ibid.):

"Of all the amendments, this is the most destructive, which requires the consent of three-fourths of both Houses to treaties ceding or restraining territorial rights. * * * There is no power in the Constitution to cede any part of the Territories of the United States. But this amendment admits, in the fullest latitude, that Congress have a right to dismember the empire." (Italics supplied.)

The proposed amendment was not adopted, and the Constitution as then ratified and as now existing contains no grant of power to cede the territorial rights of the United States. That such was the understanding of those who shared in the making of the Constitution appears from certain writings of Jefferson and Hamilton, embodied in the opinion of Mr. Justice White in Downes v. Bidwell (182 U. S. 244, 315), as follows:

"Undoubtedly the thought that under the Constitution power to disposed of people and territory, and thus annihilate the rights of American citizens, was contrary to the conceptions of the Constitution entertained by Washington and Jefferson. In the written suggestions of Mr. Jefferson, when Secretary of State, reported to President Washington in March, 1792, on the subject of the proposed negotiations between the United States and Spain, which were intended to be communicated by way of instruction to the commissioners of the United States appointed to manage such negotiations, it was observed, in discussing the possibility as to compensation being demanded by Spain 'for the ascertainment of our right' to navigate the lower part of the Mississippi, as follows:

"'We have nothing else' (than a relinquishment of certain claims on Spain) 'to give in exchange. For as to territory, we have neither the right nor the disposition to alienate an inch of what belongs to any member of our Union. (Italics supplied.) Such a proposition, therefore, is totally inadmissible and not to be treated for a moment.' Ford's Writings of Jefferson, vol. 5, p. 476.

"The rough draft of these observations was submitted to Mr. Hamilton, then Secretary of the Treasury, for suggestions, previously to sending it to the President, some time before March 5, and Hamilton made the following (among other) notes upon it: 'Is it true that the United States have no right to alienate an inch of the territory in question, except in the case of necessity intimated in another place? Or will it be useful to avow the denial of such a right? It is apprehended that the doctrine which restricts the alienation of territory to cases of extreme necessity is applicable rather to peopled territory than to waste and uninhabited districts. Positions restraining the right of the United States to accommodate to exigencies which may arise ought ever to be advanced with great caution.' (Ford's Writings of Jefferson, vol. 5, p. 443.)

"Respecting this note Mr. Jefferson commented as follows: 'The power to alienate the unpeopled territories of any State is not among the enumerated powers given by the Constitution to the General Government, and if we may go out of that instrument and accommodate to exigencies which may arise by alienating the unpeopled territory of a State, we may accommodate ourselves a little more by alienating that which is peopled, and still a little more by selling the people themselves. A shade or two more in the degree of exigency is all that will be requisite, and of that degree we shall ourselves be the judge. However, may it not be hoped that these questions are forever laid to rest by the tenth amendment, once made a part of the Constitution, declaring expressly that the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution are reserved to the States respectively? And if the General Government has no power to alienate the territory of a State, it is too irresistible an argument to deny ourselves the use of it on the present occasion."

"The opinion of Mr. Jefferson, however, met the approval of President Washington."

The only mention of "territory" in the Constitution is found in paragraph 2, section 3, Article IV, which reads:

"The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States, and nothing in this Constitution shall be construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States or any particular State."

It is argued by some that by virtue of the word "dispose" in this section Congress is authorized to alienate sovereignty as well as ownership over territory or other property belonging to the United States. Such view, however, is opposed to both the plain meaning of the section and to the uniform interpretation given it by our Supreme Court. In Scott v. Sandford (19 How., U. S. 393, 504) Mr. Justice Campbell, after an exhaustive investigation of the background of section 3, Article IV, as finally adopted, says:

"An examination of this clause of the Constitution, by the light of the circumstances in which the convention was placed, will aid us to determine its significance. The first clause is 'that new States may be admitted by the Congress to this Union.' The condition of Kentucky, Vermont, Rhode Island, and the new States to be formed in the Northwest suggested this as a necessary addition to the powers of Congress. The next clause, providing for the subdivision of the States, and the parties to consent to such an alteration, was required by the plans on foot for changes in Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, North Carolina, and Georgia. The clause which enables Congress to dispose of and make regulations regarding the public domain was demanded by the exigencies of an exhausted Treasury and a disordered finance for relief by sales and the preparation for sales of the public lands, and the last clause, that nothing in the Constitution should prejudice the claims of the United States or a particular State, was to quiet the jealousy and irritation of those who had claimed for the United States all the unappropriated lands. I look in vain among the discussions of the time for the assertion of a supreme sovereignty for Congress over the territory then belonging to the United States, or that they might thereafter acquire. I seek in vain for an enunciation that a consolidated power had been inaugurated whose subject comprehended an empire and which had no restriction but the discretion of Congress." (Italics supplied.)

"The clauses in the third section of the fourth article of the Constitution relative to the admission of new States, and the disposal and regulation of the territory of the United States, were adopted without debate in the convention." (Ibid. p. 504.)

"* * * In Pollards Lessee v. Hagan (8 How. 212) the court says: 'The United States have no constitutional capacity to exercise municipal jurisdiction, sovereignty, or eminent domain, within the limits of a State or elsewhere, except in cases where it is delegated, and the court denies the faculty of the Federal Government to add to its powers by treaty or compact.' This is a necessary consequence resulting from the nature of the Federal Constitution, which is a Federal compact among the States, establishing a limited government, with powers delegated by the people of distinct and independent communities, who reserved to their State governments and to themselves the powers they did not grant." (Ibid. p. 508.)

"I have endeavored with the assistance of these [historical documents] to find a solution for the grave and difficult question involved in this inquiry. My opinion is that the claim for Congress of supreme power in the Territories, under the grant 'to dispose of and make needful rules and regulations respecting territory,' is not supported by the historical evidence drawn from the Revolution, the Confederation, or the deliberations which preceded the ratification of the Federal Constitution. * * *

"And the advocates for government sovereignty in the Territories have been compelled to abate a portion of the pretensions originally made in its behalf and to admit that the constitutional prohibitions upon Congress operate in the Territories. But a constitutional prohibition is not requisite to ascertain a limitation upon the authority of the several departments of the Federal Government. Nor are the States or people restrained by any enumeration or definition of their rights or liberties. To impair or diminish either the departments must produce an authority from the people themselves in their Constitution; and, as we have seen, a power to make rules and regulations respecting the public domain does not confer a municipal sovereignty over persons and things upon it. * * *

"We have seen Congress does not dispose of or make rules and regulations respecting domain belonging to themselves, but belonging to the United States. These conferred on their mandatory, Congress, authority to dispose of the territory which belonged to them in common; and to accomplish that object beneficially and effectually they gave an authority to make suitable rules and regulations respecting it. When the power of disposition is fulfilled, the authority to make rules and regulations terminates, for it attaches only upon territory 'belonging to the United States.'"

"Consequently the power to make rules and regulations, from the nature of the subject, is restricted to such administrative and conservatory acts as are needful for the preservation of the public domain, and its preparation for sale or disposition. * * * But this clause in the Constitution does not exhaust the powers of Congress within the territorial subdivisions or over the persons who inhabit them. Congress may exercise there all the powers of government which belong to them as the Legislature of the United States, of which these territories make a part." (Italics supplied.) (Ibid., p. 512.)

In United States v. Gratiot (14 Pet. (U. S.) 526, 537) Mr. Justice Thompson, after quoting from section 3, Article IV, of the Constitution, said:

"The term 'territory,' as here used is merely descriptive of one kind of property, and is equivalent to the word lands. And Congress has the same power over it as over any other property belonging to the United States; and this power is vested in Congress without limitation and has been considered the foundation upon which territorial governments rest." (Italics supplied.)

Mr. Justice White in the case of Downes v. Bidwell (182 U. S. 244, 314), referring to the same subject, stated:

"I am not unmindful that there has been some contrariety of decision on the subject of the meaning of the clause empowering Congress to dispose of the Territories and other property of the United States, some adjudged cases treating that article as referring to property as such, and others deriving from it the general grant of power to govern Territories. In view, however, of the relations of the Territories to the Government of the United States at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, and the solemn pledge then existing that they should forever 'remain a part of the Confederacy of the United States of America,' I can not resist the belief that the theory that the disposing clause relates as well to a relinquishment or cession of sovereignty as to a mere transfer of rights of property is altogether erroneous." (Italics supplied.)

Given the fact that when the Constitution was adopted the United States was precluded from alienating sovereignty over any of the "Territories" then held by it, to now contend that despite such fact the framers of that instrument intended to confer such a power upon Congress as to Territories which might thereafter be acquired, is, to say the least, a forlorn argument.

In Scott v. Sandford (19 How. (U. S.) 393, 509), the court, per Campbell, J., said:

"The Constitution permits Congress to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States. This power applies as well to territory belonging to the United States within the States as beyond them. It comprehends all of the public domain, wherever it may be."

Another opinion, well worth quoting as to the meaning of the clause in question, is that of Thomas H. Benton, for 30 years a Member of the United States Senate from Missouri, who, in a book issued in 1857 entitled "A Historical and Legal Examination of the Dred Scott Case," said:

"Territories are not alluded to in it [the Constitution]. The body of the instrument shows the same thing, every clause except one being for States; and Territories, as political entities, never mentioned once; and the word 'territory' occurring but once, and that as property, assimilated to other property—as land, in fact, and as a thing to be disposed of—to be sold. Now, you never sell a territorial government, but you sell property; and in that sense alone does the word 'territory' occur, and that but once in the whole instrument. * * *

"The whole Constitution was carried out upon the principle of ignoring the existence of Territories. I speak of Territories, implying political existence and organization, in contradistinction to territory signifying land, and repeat that, as political entities, the Constitution ignores them." (Italics supplied.)

The above holdings evidence clearly and decisively that the Constitution simply confers authority upon Congress to dispose of territory as "lands." If any present confusion exists in the matter, it arises from failure to discriminate between the transfer of ownership in "territory" as property and a cession of sovereignty over "Territory" as a political entity.

If a further restraint upon the power of Congress to alienate Territorial sovereignty is required, it is found in the latter part of the clause (sec. 3, Art. IV), which reads: "And nothing in this Constitution shall be construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States or any particular State." Ownership of the public domain within a territory, no less than sovereignty over the territory as a whole, is, as we have seen, vested in the several States and the people thereof. Congress has, for instance, power to dispose of "ownership" in the 63,000,000 acres comprising the public domain of the Philippines, as it has equal authority to dispose of the ownership of the United States in its various military reservations and other property holdings. Should Congress elect, for instance, to "dispose" of Governors Island, N. Y., or the Presidio Military Reservation, San Francisco—that is, sell same to third parties—it would hardly be contended that with a transfer of such or like "property of the United States" sovereignty as well as ownership could be conveyed. Neither can it be seriously argued that it would not work "to the prejudice" of the several States and their people should Congress, through alienation of the Philippines, deprive the American people not only of their property rights in the public domain of the islands, but their political or "sovereign rights" over the entire archipelago as well.

That the Philippines are Territory of the United States, in a political sense, is not subject to dispute. As heretofore seen, Chief Justice Fuller, in the Diamond Rings Case (supra, note 1), in referring to the title acquired from Spain, said: "They [the Philippines] came under the complete and absolute sovereignty and dominion of the United States and so became territory of the United States over which civil government could be established." He then further states: "This result was the same, although there was no stipulation that the native inhabitants should be incorporated into the body politic and none securing to them the right to choose their nationality." To the same effect opinion of Attorney General Gregory (30 Op. Atty. Gen. 462 (Oct. 28, 1915)), where it is held: "While, like Porto Rico, the Philippine Islands are not incorporated into the United States, they clearly are territory of the United States, and, to the extent that Congress has assumed to legislate for them, they have been granted a form of territorial government."

It is to be said that Congress, by its organic act of August 29, 1916, established a complete form of territorial government for the Philippines, including executive, judicial, and legislative departments, and that the officials of the government so organized take oath to support and maintain the Constitution of the United States. This organic act or charter differs only in matters of detail from the charters of other "Territories" organized by act of Congress.

In National Bank v. Yankton (101 U. S. 129, 133), Waite, C. J., defining the nature of Territories in their relation to the United States, said:

"All territory within the jurisdiction of the United States not included in any State must necessarily be governed by or under the authority of Congress. The Territories are but political subdivisions of the outlying dominion of the United States. Their relation to the General Government is much the same as that which counties bear to the respective States, and Congress may legislate for them as a State does for its municipal organizations." (Italics supplied.)

Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of Loughborough v. Blake (5 Wheat. (U. S.) 317), decided in 1820, discussing the constitutional provision that "all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States," thus stated what territory was included within such provision (p. 319):

"The power then to lay and collect duties, imposts, and excises may be exercised, and must be exercised throughout the United States. Does this term designate the whole, or any particular portion of the American empire? Certainly this question can admit of but one answer. It is the name given to our great Republic, which is composed of States and Territories. The District of Columbia or the territory west of the Missouri, is not less within the United States than Maryland or Pennsylvania."

This "territory west of the Missouri," declared by Chief Justice Marshall to be no less a part of the "American empire" than Maryland or Pennsylvania, was not held in 1820 under any firmer title or more complete sovereignty than is the territory of the Philippines, today organized and operating by virtue of laws enacted by the Government of the United States.

It can safely be said, therefore, that the Constitution confers no power upon Congress, either express or implied, to alienate sovereignty over any territory belonging to the United States.

POWER ACTUALLY VESTED IN CONGRESS AS TO TERRITORIES

A comprehensive statement both of the source and the limits of congressional authority over Territories, appears in Dorr v. United States (195 U. S. 138, 140), where Mr. Justice Day, discussing whether or not trial by jury was a constitutional right in the Philippines, said:

"It may be regarded as settled that the Constitution of the United States is the only source of power authorizing action by any branch of the Federal Government. 'The Government of the United States was born of the Constitution, and all powers which it enjoys or may exercise must be either derived expressly or by implication from that instrument.' [Citing cases.] It is equally well settled that the United States may acquire territory in the exercise of the treaty-making power by direct cession as the result of war, and in making effectual the terms of peace; and for that purpose has the powers of other sovereign nations. This principle has been recognized by this court from its earliest decisions. The convention which framed the Constitution of the United States, in view of the territory already possessed and the possibility of acquiring more, inserted in that instrument in Article IV, section 3, a grant of express power to Congress 'to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.'"

"As early as the February term, 1810, of this court, in the case of Sere v. Pitot (6 Cranch, 332), Chief Justice Marshall, delivering the opinion of the court, said: 'The power of governing and of legislating for a Territory is the inevitable consequence of the right to acquire and to hold territory. Could this position be contested, the Constitution of the United States declares that 'Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.' Accordingly we find Congress possessing and exercising the absolute and undisputed power of governing and legislating for the Territory of Orleans. Congress has given them a legislature, an executive, and a judiciary, with such powers as it has been their will to assign to those departments, respectively."

"And later, the same eminent judge, delivering the opinion of the court in the leading case upon the subject American Inc. Co. v. Canter (1 Pet. 511), says:

"The Constitution confers absolutely on the Government of the Union the powers of making war and of making treaties; consequently that Government possesses the power of acquiring territory, either by conquest or by treaty. . . ."

"While these cases and others which are cited in the late case of Downes v. Bidwell, supra, sustain the right of Congress to make laws for the government of Territories without being subject to all the restrictions which are imposed upon that body when passing laws for the United States, considered as a political body of States in Union, the exercise of the power expressly granted to govern the Territories is not without limitation. Speaking of this power, Mr. Justice Curtis, in the case of Scott v. Sanford (19 How. 393, 614), said:

"If, then, this clause does contain a power to legislate respecting the Territory, what are the limits of that power? To this I answer that, in common with all the other legislative powers of Congress, it finds limits in the express prohibitions on Congress not to do certain things; that, in the exercise of the legislative power, Congress can not pass an ex post facto law or bill of attainder; and so in respect to each of the other prohibitions contained in the Constitution."

" . . . Until Congress shall see fit to incorporate territory ceded by treaty into the United States, we regard it as settled by that decision (Downes v. Bidwell) that the Territory is to be governed under the power existing in Congress to make laws for such Territory, and subject to such constitutional restrictions upon the powers of that body as are applicable to the situation." (Italics supplied.)

In Murphy v. Ramsay (114 U. S. 15, 44) the court, per Matthews, J., said:

"The people of the United States, as sovereign owners of the National Territories, have supreme power over them and their inhabitants. In the exercise of this sovereign dominion, they are represented by the Government of the United States, to whom all the powers of government over that subject have been delegated, subject only to such restrictions as are expressed in the Constitution or are necessarily implied in its terms or in the purposes and objects of the power itself; for it may well be admitted in respect to this, as to every power of society over its members, that it is not absolute and unlimited."

In McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheat. (U. S.) 816, 422), Chief Justice Marshall refers to the "universal acquiescence in the construction which has been uniformly put on the third section of the fourth article of the Constitution," to wit, that the power to "make all needful rules and regulations respecting the Territory or other property of the United States" is not more comprehensive than the power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers of the Government."

Mr. Justice White, speaking for the court in Downes v. Bidwell (182 U. S. 244, 290), discusses the subject as follows:

"In some adjudged cases the power to locally govern at discretion has been declared to arise as an incident to the right to acquire territory. In others it has been rested under the clause of section 3, Article IV, of the Constitution, which vests Congress with the power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the Territory or other property of the United States. But this divergence, if not conflict of opinion, does not imply that the authority of Congress to govern the Territories is outside the Constitution, since in either case the right is founded on the Constitution, although referred to different provisions of that instrument. . . ."

"As Congress in governing the Territories is subject to the Constitution, it results that all the limitations of the Constitution which are applicable to Congress in exercising this authority necessarily limit its power on this subject. It follows also that every provision of the Constitution which is applicable to the Territories is also controlling therein." (Italics supplied.)

In De Lima v. Bidwell (182 U. S. 1, 196), Justice Brown, describing the source and extent of congressional authority over the Territories, said:

"It is an authority which arises not necessarily from the Territorial clause of the Constitution but from the necessities of the case and from the inability of the States to act upon the subject. Under this power Congress may deal with territory acquired by treaty; may administer its government as it does that of the District of Columbia; it may organize a local Territorial government; it may admit it as a State upon an equality with other States; it may sell its public lands to individual citizens or may donate them as homesteads to actual settlers."

Hon. Charles S. Lobingier, for many years a member of the Philippine Judiciary, and later Judge of the United States Court for China, in an article on "Territories" contributed to Cyclopedia of Law and Procedure, thus succinctly states the powers and limitations of Congress in the premises (38 Cyc. 200):

"B. Power of United States Congress to legislate: Congress has plenary power over the Territories unlimited by the restrictions of the Constitution, so long as they remain in a Territorial condition, and may legislate for them as a State does for the municipal organizations, and may annul the acts of a Territorial legislature either directly or indirectly, by passing inconsistent legislation, and may not only abrogate laws of the Territorial legislatures but may legislate directly for the local government. It may make a void act of the Territorial legislature valid, and a valid act void. But the power of Congress over Territories may be limited by treaty (and an act of Congress passed subsequent to a treaty of cession can not affect titles perfected thereunder), or by lack of authority, express or implied, to legislate on the subject, for instance, to alienate territory of the United States." (Italics supplied.)

As will be seen from these citations, the only power possessed by Congress over Territories is derived from authority to "make needful rules and regulations" therefor, or from the necessity of governing such Territories "because of the inability of the States to act on the subject"; and that, in exercising this authority, Congress is limited to the "purposes and objects of the power itself"; i. e., to providing a form of government for such Territories, and to making such laws therefor "as shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers of the Government." Furthermore, that these legislative functions of Congress, in their application, are subject to such restrictions as "are expressed in the Constitution or are necessarily implied in its terms." It will hardly be contended, we take it, that the power to alienate sovereignty is incident to or included in the power to legislate. In fact, it is as widely separated therefrom as the poles, for it would destroy the very thing over which legislation is authorized and to be exercised.

Belief is current that in the so-called insular cases our Supreme Court held that the Constitution did not extend to the Philippines, and that Congress is therefore free to work its will over them. What those cases actually decided is detailed by Mr. Justice Day in Dorr v. United States (supra, note 30) and is further expressed as follows by Chief Justice Taft in Balsac v. Porto Rico (258 U. S. 298, 312):

"The Constitution of the United States is in force in Porto Rico as it is wherever and whenever the sovereign power of that Government is exerted. This has not only been admitted but emphasized by this court in all its authoritative expressions upon the issues arising in the Insular Cases, especially in Downes v. Bidwell and the Dorr cases. The Constitution, however, contains grants of power and limitations which in the nature of things are not always and everywhere applicable, and the real issue in the Insular Cases was not whether the Constitution extended to the Philippines and Porto Rico when we went there, but which of its provisions were applicable by way of limitation upon the exercise of executive and legislative power in dealing with new conditions and requirements. The guaranties of certain fundamental personal rights declared in the Constitution, as, for instance, that no person could be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, had from the beginning full application in the Philippines and Porto Rico. * * * Indeed, provision is made for the consideration of constitutional questions coming on appeal and writ of error from the Supreme Court of the Philippines, which are certainly not incorporated in the Union."

Not only is there no holding or intimation here that Congress can go outside the Constitution in its dealings with the Philippines, but a reiteration that the principles and guaranties of that instrument are fundamental "wherever and whenever the sovereign power of the United States is exercised." Congress can not, for instance, dispossess private owners of one square meter of land in the Philippines without due process of law, and yet the anomalous claim is made that it possesses the far greater right of divesting—without process or sanction—the title and sovereignty of the American people over the entire archipelago, as also the unlimited and unrestricted power to transfer lands, people, and government, with or without consideration, to whomsoever it pleases.

CERTAIN CLAIMS MADE BY THOSE ASSERTING POWER IN CONGRESS TO ALIENATE THE PHILIPPINES

It has been argued that the right to acquire territory implies a right to alienate it. As well might it be argued that an attorney in fact, authorized simply to administer lands—and, under certain conditions, to acquire additional property at the expense and in the name of his principal—Ipsa facto becomes vested with authority to sell or give away such new holdings merely because secured through his agency. It is to be remembered that territory once acquired by the United States does not belong to the President, to Congress, or to the Government, but to the people, who have delegated no authority to convey their sovereign rights therein.

Our action as to Cuba and the Isle of Pines furnishes no precedent for alienation. Cuba was not ceded to the United States, the treaty merely reciting that Spain "relinquishes all claim of sovereignty and title to Cuba." As to the Isle of Pines, question arose with the Cuban Government as to whether such island was ceded to the United States or constituted an integral part of Cuba. The doubt was resolved in Cuba's favor, and the United States, by treaty with that country, "relinquished in favor of Cuba all claim of title to the Isle of Pines." The same thing is true of various boundary settlements where adjustment was predicated upon like conflicts of title. There was no cession or alienation of sovereignty, the final conclusion in all such cases being that none had existed.

Stress is laid by others upon the fact that under the treaty with Spain it is provided: "The civil rights and political status of the native inhabitants of the Territories hereby ceded to the United States shall be determined by the Congress," it being claimed that this clause somehow confers a power upon Congress, otherwise denied it, to alienate sovereignty over the Philippines. The answers to this are various.

As heretofore seen, Chief Justice Fuller held in the Diamond Rings Case that, by virtue of the cession from Spain, the Philippines "came under the complete and absolute sovereignty and dominion of the United States," and "the grantee [the United States] in accepting them took nothing less than the whole grant." He then further states that "the result was the same, although there was no stipulation that the native inhabitants should be incorporated into the body politic, and none securing to them the right to choose their nationality."

In De Lima v. Bidwell (182 U. S. 1, 195) Mr. Justice Brown, construing the force and effect of the Paris treaty as regards the territory ceded thereby, said:

"One of the ordinary incidents of a treaty is the cession of territory. It is not too much to say it is the rule rather than the exception that a treaty of peace following upon a war provides for a cession of territory to the victorious party. It was said by Chief Justice Marshall in American Insurance Co. v. Canter (1 Pet. 511, 542): 'The Constitution confers absolutely upon the Government of the Union the powers of making war and of making treaties; consequently that Government possesses the power of acquiring territory, either by conquest or by treaty.' The territory thus acquired is acquired as absolutely as if the annexation were made, as in the case of Texas and Hawaii, by an act of Congress."

"It follows from this that by the ratification of the treaty of Paris the island became territory of the United States, although not an organized Territory in the technical sense of the word." (Italics supplied.)

And further in the same case it is said (p. 180):

"If * * * the question were broadly presented whether a country which had been ceded to us, the cession accepted, possession delivered, and the island occupied and administered without interference by Spain or any other power, was a foreign country or domestic territory, it would seem that there could be as little hesitation in answering this question as there would be in determining the ownership of a house deeded in fee simple to a purchaser who had accepted the deed, gone into possession, paid taxes, and made improvements without let or hindrance from his vendor."

Not only was there a complete and unqualified cession by Spain of her sovereign rights and dominion over the Philippine Archipelago, but an equally unqualified acceptance of the grant by the other sovereign power. Nothing further was left to be done or can be done in that regard, nor does American sovereignty over such islands now occupy any nebulous or intermediate state authorizing Congress to treat them differently from any other territory heretofore acquired by or belonging to the United States.

The Constitution makes no distinction between territories when once definitely ceded to or annexed by the United States. Whether unorganized, organized, or incorporated, title and sovereignty in every such case are identical, and Congress is no more authorized to override constitutional limitations, or to alienate sovereign rights, in one instance than in another. Its authority to legislate for any such territory, and to designate the measure of political rights to be enjoyed by the inhabitants, results solely from the fact that the particular territory involved, whatever its classification, belongs to the United States and is subject to the sovereign rights of the American people. As heretofore stated, the Philippines are now organized and operating under a complete form of civil government extended them by Congress, and constitute, in the language of the court in National Bank v. Yankton (supra, note 27), "a political subdivision of the outlying dominion of the United States."

It is to be observed also that had nothing whatever been said in the treaty as to the native inhabitants of the ceded territory, the matter of their "political rights" would have been equally within the jurisdiction of Congress. The clause in question neither adds to nor subtracts from congressional authority, being merely declarative of a power already vested in that body. As stated by Matthews, J., in

Murphy v. Ramsay (supra, note 31), where a question arose in regard to the Territory of Utah:

"The personal and civil rights of the inhabitants of the Territories are secured to them as to other citizens by the principles of constitutional liberty which restrain all the agencies of Government, State and National; their political rights are franchises which they hold as privileges in the legislative discretion of the Congress of the United States." (Italics supplied.)

In other words, Congress is now empowered, in its discretion, not only to confer such political rights upon the Philippine people as are enjoyed by the inhabitants of any American Territory but also to incorporate such Territory as a State of the Union. On the other hand, it can postpone such action indefinitely, as it could equally do had the treaty (as in the case of Alaska) provided that the inhabitants "shall be admitted to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States."

"The declaration that the United States may acquire territory to be formed into States, but not to be held indefinitely as colonies, is a proposition clearly without any practical value; it is a rule which can not by any possibility be enforced. Territory may be acquired and must be governed by Congress. How long it shall remain in its condition of dependence, or when it shall be erected into a State, is a matter to be determined exclusively by the National Legislature. Congress can not be compelled to act; nor can Territories be clothed with the attributes of States without the action of Congress. 'New States may be admitted by the Congress into the Union.' This language is simply permissive. When the admission shall be effected, and how long it shall be delayed, are matters residing entirely within the congressional discretion." (Italics supplied.) (Pomeroy, Constitutional Law, sec. 408.)

Here, again, whatever confusion exists as to the power of Congress over the Philippines, arises through failure to distinguish between the "political rights" extended the occupants of territory ceded to the United States, and sovereignty and dominion over the territory itself. Sovereignty and dominion would apply even though the territory was unpeopled, and would continue to apply even though all the inhabitants at the time of cession were eliminated.

Recurring to our analogy of an attorney in fact, it would not be contended that such an attorney, authorized simply to acquire lands for his principal, and to specify what relation the occupants should bear to the new owner would have the right in consequence to dispose of the fee title to such lands. It is or should be equally clear that Congress, under a legislative power limited to providing what political rights shall be enjoyed by the inhabitants of a ceded territory, does not acquire thereby the further and altogether independent power of alienating the sovereign rights of its principal over the territory so inhabited. In Downes v. Bidwell (182 U. S. 244, 359) Chief Justice Fuller, with whom concurred Justices Harlan, Brewer, and Peckham, stated:

"The powers delegated by the people to their agents are not enlarged by the expansion of the domain within which they are to be exercised. When the restriction on the exercise of a particular power by a particular agent is ascertained, that is the end of the question. To hold otherwise is to overthrow the basis of our constitutional law, and, moreover, in effect, to reassert the proposition that the States and not the people created the Government."

While appearing in a dissenting opinion, the principle above stated is sound sense, as it is undoubtedly good law.

Whatever may have been contemplated by the treaty, however, or whatever may be claimed for it, the powers of Congress are not and can not be enlarged thereby.

"The Government of the United States, as was well observed in the argument, is one of limited powers. It can exercise authority over no subject except those which have been delegated to it. Congress can not, by legislation, enlarge the Federal jurisdiction, nor can it be enlarged under the treaty-making power." (Italics supplied.) (New Orleans v. United States, 10 Pet. (U. S.) 602, 736.)

"It need hardly be said that a treaty can not change the Constitution or be held valid if it be in violation of that instrument. This results from the nature and fundamental principles of our Government." (Cherokee Tobacco case, 11 Wall. (U. S.) 610, 620.)

In Marbury v. Madison (1 Cranch. (U. S.) 137, 176) Chief Justice Marshall, speaking of the force and effect of the Constitution, said:

"This original and supreme will organizes the Government and assigns to different departments their respective powers. It may either stop here or establish certain limits not to be transcended by those departments. The Government of the United States is of the latter description. The powers of the Legislature are defined and limited; and that those limits may not be mistaken or forgotten, the Constitution is written. To what purpose are powers limited, and to what purpose is that limitation committed to writing, if these limits may, at any time, be passed by those intended to be restrained?"

It has been urged by some that the distance of the Philippines, the character of their inhabitants, and the possible dangers involved in our retaining them, create an emergency situation which can only be met through their alienation, and that unless Congress can act in the matter we are altogether helpless. Cooley, in his Principles of Constitutional Law (p. 33), referring to this line of reasoning, says:

"The Constitution itself never yields to treaty or enactment; it neither changes with time, nor does it in theory bend to the force of circumstances. It may be amended according to its own permission; but while it stands it is 'a law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men, at all times and under all circumstances.' Its principles, therefore, can not be set aside in order to meet the supposed necessities of great crises. 'No doctrine involving more pernicious consequences was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of government. Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy or despotism, but the theory of necessity on which it is based is false, for the Government, within the Constitution, has all the powers granted to it which are necessary to preserve its existence, as has been happily proved by the result of the great effort to throw off its just authority.'" (Ex parte Milligan, 4 Wall. (U. S.) 2, 120.)

Should time or shaping circumstances disclose, either as regards the Philippines or any other Territory of the United States, that it would be well to reverse the policy—or fears—of the framers of the Constitution, and to vest in Congress an unrestricted power to alienate sovereignty in its discretion, it is always within the province of the American people—in whom such sovereignty is vested—to confer such power upon Congress through an amendment to the Constitution. As stated by our Supreme Court in Kansas v. Colorado (206 U. S. 40, 90), speaking through Mr. Justice Brewer:

"The people who adopted the Constitution knew that in the nature of things they could not foresee all the questions which might arise in the future, all the circumstances which might call for the exercise of further national powers than those granted to the United States; and, after making provision for an amendment to the Constitution by which any needed additional powers could be granted, they reserved to themselves all powers not so delegated." (Italics supplied.)

"Lest we forget," it might be well for our people, and for those whom they clothe with brief authority, to read and ponder in this connection Washington's memorable Farewell Address. He there has this to say concerning the founding of our Government and the relation of the Constitution thereto:

"This Government, the offspring of our own choice, uninfluenced and unawed, adopted upon full investigation and mature deliberation, completely free in its principles, in the distribution of its powers, uniting security with energy, and containing within itself a provision for its own amendment, has a just claim to your confidence and your support. Respect for its authority, compliance with its laws, acquiescence in its measures are duties enjoined by the fundamental maxims of true liberty. The basis of our political systems is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions of government. But the constitution which at any time exists, until changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people, is sacredly obligatory upon all. * * *

"It is important, likewise, that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power and proneness to abuse it which predominates in the human heart is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position. If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way the Constitution designates. But let there be no change by usurpation, for though this, in one instance, may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil any partial or transitory benefit which the use can at any time yield." (Italics supplied.)

What, then, is the criterion which should guide in determining whether or not Congress is empowered, under the Constitution, to alienate "territory of the United States" where sovereignty and dominion are clearly vested in the American people? Mr. Justice Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution (Story, Commentaries on the Constitution, sec. 1243), states the rule as follows:

"Whenever, therefore, a question arises concerning the constitutionality of a particular power, the first question is whether the power be expressed in the Constitution; if it be, the question is decided. If it be not expressed, the next inquiry must be whether it is properly an incident to an express power and necessary to its execution; if it be, then it may be exercised by Congress. If not, Congress can not exercise it." (Italics supplied.) (Quoted with approval in United States v. Harris, 106 U. S. 629, 641.)

Tried by this requirement, what, in a final summing of our argument, is the situation as respects the power of Congress to alienate sovereignty over the Philippine Islands?

If in the foregoing discussion we have correctly interpreted the decisions of our courts and other data relevant to the issue, the following appears:

That complete and absolute sovereignty and dominion over the Philippine archipelago now exists in the United States, nothing less than the whole grant having been ceded and accepted.

That the Federal Government, in acquiring such sovereignty and dominion, acted simply as the agent and representative of the American people, the sovereign owners, and that such territory is now held and administered for their common use and benefit as principal.

That neither Congress nor any other governmental agency has authority to alienate this sovereignty or to compromise the rights of the American people therein, except as the power so to do may have been delegated to or conferred upon them.

That the Constitution—which defines and limits the sovereign rights surrendered by the people to the Government created by them—confers no power upon Congress, either express or implied, to alienate sovereignty over any territory of the United States, nor is any such authority properly incident to or necessary for the execution of any power granted by that instrument or resulting therefrom.

That a proposition looking to conferring such a power upon Congress was expressly rejected by the framers of the Constitution; that the Constitutional Convention was precluded by previous commitments from granting such a power as to Territories then belonging to the United States, and that subsequent declarations of leading members of the convention indicate that no such power was granted or contemplated, either as to existing Territories or those which might thereafter be acquired.

That the only power vested in Congress as respects territory of the United States is to make needful rules and regulations for disposing of the public domain, and to govern such territory, i. e., to legislate therefor, so long as it occupies a Territorial status.

That this power in Congress to legislate for Territories results because "of the inability of the States to act in the premises," and is limited "to the purposes and objects of the power itself," and subject to such restrictions as "are expressed in the Constitution, or are necessarily implied by its terms."

That alienation of sovereignty is not an incident to nor remotely included within the power "to legislate," but is diametrically opposed thereto.

That authority in Congress to transfer ownership in territory, i. e., the public domain or other property of the United States, does not affect or include sovereignty over the territory itself, which sovereignty applies, and would continue to apply, even though the territory was unpeopled, or the inhabitants of such territory when acquired were completely extinguished.

That the treaty of Paris, providing that the civil rights and political status of the native inhabitants of the Philippines should be determined by Congress, is merely declarative of a power already vested in that body and confers no sovereign or despotic rights over the territory so inhabited.

That treaty provisions can not, in any case, override constitutional limitations, nor does the fact that Congress, as a legislative body, is empowered to prescribe what "political rights" the inhabitants of a Territory shall bear to the sovereign power, authorize it to usurp new and altogether unrelated functions, never conferred upon it by its principal.

That the Philippine archipelago is to-day, by congressional act, an organized Territory of the United States provided with complete legislative, executive, and judicial departments, and constitutes, as truly as any other of our existing Territories, "a political subdivision of the outlying dominion of the United States."

That alienation of the Philippines by Congress would operate "to the prejudice" of the United States and the people thereof—the lawful owners—and would be in violation of the express prohibition contained in section 3, Article IV of the Constitution, relating to territorial possessions.

If the conclusions enumerated above are sound, it logically follows that Congress has no present power to alienate sovereignty over the Philippines, or over any Territory of the United States. If this be the fact, then such power can come into being only through an amendment to the Constitution, wherein the American people expressly authorize Congress, as their agent and representative, to surrender, sell, or give away their sovereign rights in and over such Territory as and to whom such agent may see fit.

Should it be contended, however, that the within argument does not definitely establish the conclusions above announced, and at most simply casts a doubt upon the authority of Congress in the premises, what then should be the attitude of our Senators and Congressmen in dealing with the question? The answer to this, and it is a weighty one, is set out by Cooley in his constitutional limitations (p. 109) as follows:

"But when all the legitimate lights for ascertaining the meaning of the Constitution have been made use of it may still happen that the construction remains a matter of doubt. In such a case it seems clear that everyone called upon to act where, in his opinion, the proposed action would be of doubtful constitutionality is bound upon the doubt alone to abstain from acting. Whoever derives power from the Constitution to perform any public function is disloyal to that instrument and grossly derelict in duty, if he does that which he is not reasonably satisfied the Constitution permits. Whether the power be legislative, executive, or judicial, there is manifest disregard of constitutional and moral obligation by one who, having taken an oath to support that instrument, takes part in an action which he can not say he believes to be no violation of its provisions. A doubt of the constitutionality of any proposed legislative enactment should in any case be reason sufficient for refusing to attempt it; and, if legislators do not act upon this principle, the reasons upon which are based the judicial decisions sustaining legislation in very many cases will cease to be of force."

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, March 22, 1926.

CONVENTION BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND THE REPUBLIC OF CUBA FOR THE SUPPRESSION OF SMUGGLING OPERATIONS BETWEEN THEIR RESPECTIVE TERRITORIES

The United States of America and the Republic of Cuba, being desirous of aiding each other in the suppression of smuggling from the territory of one state to the other, have agreed to enter into the present Convention and for this purpose have appointed as their respective plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States of America, Mr. Enoch H. Crowder, Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America in Cuba, and

The President of the Republic of Cuba, Mr. Carlos Manuel de Céspedes y de Quesada, Secretary of State of the Republic of Cuba,

Who, having communicated to each other their respective full powers, found to be in due and proper form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE I

The High Contracting Parties agree to aid each other mutually in the manner provided in this Convention in the prevention, discovery and punishment of violations of their respective laws, decrees or regulations with respect to the importation of narcotics, intoxicating liquors and other merchandise and the entry and departure of aliens.

ARTICLE II

The High Contracting Parties agree that clearance of shipments of merchandise by water, air, or land, from any of the ports of either country to a port of entry of the country, shall be denied when such shipment comprises articles the importation of which is prohibited or restricted in the country to which such shipment is destined, unless in this last case there has been a compliance with the requisites demanded by the laws of both countries.

The High Contracting Parties likewise bind themselves to prevent by all means possible, in accordance with the laws of their respective countries, the clearance of any vessel or vehicle laden with merchandise or having on board aliens destined to any port or place, when it is evident by reason of the tonnage, size, type of vessel, or vehicle, length of the voyage, perils or conditions of navigation or transportation, that it is impossible for it to transport said merchandise or persons to the place of destination mentioned in the request for clearance, or when the repetition of alleged accidents in prior voyages or the antecedents of or information concerning the vessels or vehicle furnish evidence that said merchandise or any part of the same or any person, whatever the ostensible point of destination thereof might be, is intended to be illegally introduced into the territory of the other High Contracting Party.

When one of the High Contracting Parties gives notice to the other that it suspects that a specified vessel in a port of the other High Contracting Party, although ostensibly destined to a port in a third country, is likely to attempt to introduce unlawfully into its territory merchandise or persons whose entry is prohibited or restricted, the other High Contracting Party shall require from the master or person in charge of the vessel—in accordance with the laws in force in the respective countries and such additional arrangements as may be agreed upon and incorporated in regulations by the appropriate authorities of the High Contracting Parties—a bond to produce a duly authenticated landing certificate showing such merchandise or persons actually to have been discharged at the port for which the vessel cleared. If any such vessel fails to produce the certificate in proof of lawful discharge of such merchandise or persons or produces a false certificate or evidence the bond shall be forfeited and thereafter for a period of five years the vessel shall be denied the right to enter or clear from any port of either of the High Contracting Parties with merchandise or persons of the same nature.

ARTICLE III

The High Contracting Parties agree to employ all reasonable measures—in accordance with the laws of their respective countries—to prevent the departure of persons destined to the territory of either of them who do not effect such departure through the ports of departure and are not destined to a port of entry in the other country.

Persons who are not nationals of either of the High Contracting Parties and who, coming from the territory of one of them, have attempted to enter unlawfully into the territory of the other and are returned to the territory of the High Contracting Party from which they proceeded, shall be returned in accordance with the laws in force in the country from which they are returned and such additional arrangements as may be agreed upon or incorporated in regulations by the appropriate authorities of the High Contracting Parties in order that such persons may be deported to the country of their origin.

ARTICLE IV

Each of the High Contracting Parties agrees with the other that property of all kinds in its possession which, having been stolen in the territory of the other and brought into its territory, is seized by its customs authorities, shall, when the owners are nationals of the other country, be returned to such owners, subject to satisfactory proof of such ownership and the absence of any collusion, and subject moreover to payment of the expenses of the seizure and detention and to the abandonment of any claims by the owners against the customs, or the customs officers, warehousemen, or agents, for compensation or damages for the seizure, detention, warehousing or keeping of the property.

ARTICLE V

The High Contracting Parties mutually agree that they will exchange or furnish when requested information concerning:

(a) The transportation of cargoes or the shipment of merchandise between said countries,

(b) The names and activities of the persons or vessels which are known to be or suspected of being engaged in the violation of the laws, decrees and regulations mentioned in Article I of this Convention,

(c) Persons leaving their territories who are destined to the territory of the other High Contracting Party or the activities of any persons in either country, when there are reasonable grounds to believe that said persons are engaged in unlawful migration activities or in conspiracies against the other Government or its institutions, when not incompatible with the public interest,

(d) The existence and extent of contagious and infectious diseases of persons, animals, birds, or plants, and the ravages of insect pests and the measures being taken to prevent their spreading, and

(e) The study and use of the most effective scientific and administrative methods for the suppression and eradication of said diseases and insect pests.

ARTICLE VI

The officials of the High Contracting Parties whose duty it may be to prevent or report the violation of the laws, decrees and regulations mentioned in Article I of this Convention are obliged, as soon as they have knowledge of preparations to smuggle or that smuggling has been effected, to do everything possible to prevent the same through all the means within their power in the first case, and to bring the matter to the attention of the proper authorities of their own country, in either of the two circumstances.

The appropriate authorities of each of the High Contracting Parties shall notify the appropriate authorities of the other High Contracting Party of violations of the laws, decrees and regulations mentioned in Article I of this Convention which have been communicated to them relative to attempts at smuggling or actual smuggling, and will furnish all information which they may have been able to gather with regard to the facts and circumstances thereof.

Such notification and information may be furnished and received only by appropriate officials who shall be designated by the respective Governments.

ARTICLE VII

It is agreed that the customs and other administrative officials of the respective governments of the United States of America and of the Republic of Cuba shall upon request be directed to attend as witnesses before the courts in the other country and to produce such available records and files or certified copies thereof as may be considered essential to the trial of civil or criminal cases arising out of violation of the laws, decrees or regulations mentioned in Article I of this Convention and as may be produced compatibly with the public interest. It shall be considered in these cases that they appear as agents of their respective governments, to inform the courts on matters upon which questioned, and when they so appear their character as such agents shall be recognized. Original records or documents produced by said officials shall not be retained by the courts, but legal copies thereof may be taken if necessary.

The cost of transcripts of records, depositions, certificates and letters rogatory in civil or criminal cases, and the cost of first-class transportation both ways, maintenance and other proper expenses involved in the attendance of such witnesses shall be paid by the nation requesting their attendance at the time of their discharge by the court from further attendance at such trial. Letters rogatory and commissions shall be executed with all possible despatch and copies of official records or documents shall be certified promptly by the appropriate officials in accordance with the provisions of the laws of the respective countries.

ARTICLE VIII

This Convention shall be ratified, and the ratifications shall be exchanged in the City of Havana as soon as possible. The Convention shall come into effect at the expiration of ten days from the date of the exchange of ratifications, and it shall remain in force for one year. If upon the expiration of one year no notice is given by either party of a desire to terminate the same, it shall continue in force until thirty days after either party shall have given notice to the other of a desire to terminate it.

In witness whereof the Plenipotentiaries above mentioned have signed the two originals of the present Convention and have affixed their respective seals thereto.

Done in two copies of the same text and legal force in the English and Spanish languages in the City of Habana, this eleventh day of March in the year one thousand nine hundred and twenty-six.
